
THE

HISTORY

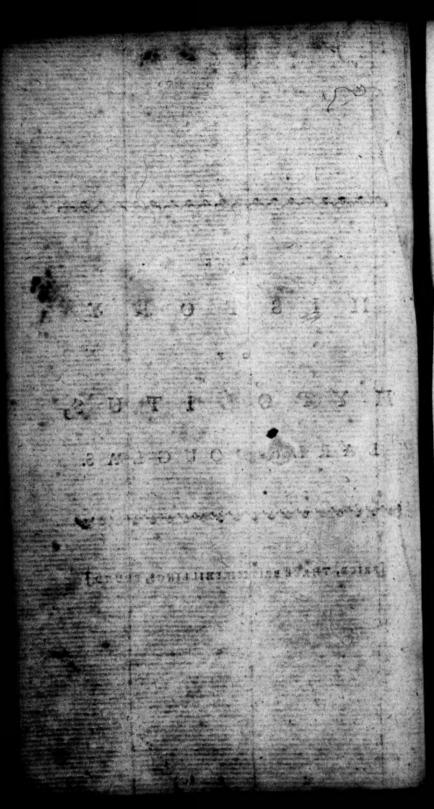

O F

HYPOLITUS,

EARL OF DOUGLAS.

[PRICE, THREE BRITISH SHILLINGS, BOUND.]

TAX STRAKE TO VAL

HISTORY

OF

H Y P O L I T U S. EARL OF D O U G L A S.

HISTORICAL ANECDOTES

TRANSLATED FROM THE FRENCH,

CORK:

PRINTED BY WILLIAM PLYN,

AT THE SHAKESPEAR,

M.DCC.LEVILL

AOTAIN

e WIT I O T T H

a A d D J O C D J J A A

BUTOCOENA FROME OTELI

appear for Loab catedone.

STAN PIN AS DANK

CORKE

while it with the sea constitution of

Alest mans sur th

.11: 723.323134

SUBSCRIBERS NAMES.

THE RIGHT HONOURABLE RICHARD, BARL OF SHANNON.

A

and the second second

Mr George Aickin
Mr Francis Allen
Mr George Allen
Mr George Allen
Mr. William Anderson
Mr Downing Anderson
John Archer, Esq;
Mr Peter Ardouin, 20 Books
Mr George Armstead
Walter Atkins, Esq;
Master William Austen

John Bernard, Efq;
Patrick Blair, Efq; M. D.
Mr James Bonwell
Mr John Bowles
Rev. Archdeacon Browne
Mr Tobet Brown
Mr Thomas Browne
Rev. Thomas Browne
Mr. William Browne
John Bullen, Efq;

Mafter Benfon Roger Bernard, Efg:

B

Mr John Bardin Bookfelfeller, 21 Books
Mr Roger Barret
Mrs. Elizabeth Barret
Mr James Barry
Stackpole Baylee, Efq;
Mr Samuel Bayly
Mr Emanuel Bayly
Mr John Bennet
Mr James Bennet
Mr Paul Benfon

Mr Peter Cambridge, june Hugh Carleton, Elq; Recorder of Cork Christopher Carleton, Ring John Carleton, Esq. Mrs Carleton Mrs Carmentrang

Broderick Chinney, Efg, Mr St. Leger Chinney Mrs Jane Clark of Dublia Mili Margaret Clark Mr William Clark, june

Mr William Coles Mr Michael Coppinger Wallis Corthurst, Esq; William Connor, Efq; Roger Connor, Efq; Mrs Connor of Connorville Mr Patrick Connor Mr Edmond Conway Mr St. John Cooke Mr Peter Coffart Mrs Coffart, 2 Books. Mrs Goughlan of Youghall Mrs Margret Coughlan Mrs Mary Coughlan Rev. Sir Michael Cox, Bart Mr John Crone William Crook, Efq; Mr Wiliam Crofts Mr William Croker Mr Humphry Crowley

Mr John Daly
Mr Eugene Daly
Mrs Eleanor Day
Rowland Davis, Efq;
Rev. Thomas Davis
Robert Davis, Efq;
Mr Richard Davis
Rev. Edward Delany
Robert De La Cour, Efq;
Mr Henry Delamain
Mr John Dennis
Stephen Denroche, Efq;
Mr Charles Denroch
Abraham Devonsher, Efq;
M. P.

Mr William Devereux Mr John Digby Arthur Dillon, Efq; Miss Dobbins Mr St. John Dupond Mrs Durdon

F

Riggs Falkiner, Efq; M. P.
Mrs Falkiner
Stannard Farren, Efq;
Mr John Ferrar, Bookfeller in Limerick
Mr William Fitton
Mr Richard Fitton
Mr Alexander Fitton
Mr George Fitzgerald
Walter Fitzfimons, Efq;
Mr Lionel Fleming
Mr William Flyn, Printer
and Bookfeller, 21 Books Mathias Freeman, Efq;
Mr Robert Freeman

G

Mr James Gallwey
Piercy Gethins, Efq;
Barth, Gibbings Efq;
Mr Thomas Gollock
Michael Goold, Efq;
Robert Gordon, Efq; Surveyor General
Thomas Grant, Efq;
Francis Gray, junt Efq;
William Greatrax, Efq;

Mr James Gregg Mr John Guitton Mr Isaac Guitton

H

John Haly, Esq; M. D. Miss Hamilton John Harding, Efq; Mr Henry Hardy Miss Elizabeth Hare Miss Margaret Hare Mr Richard Hare James Hartnett, Efq; Mr William Herd Robert Hoare, Efq; Joseph Hoare, Esq; Samuel Hoare, Efq; Wiliam Hodder, Efq; Miss Mary Hurrue Miss Anastatia Hurrue Colonel Hutchinson Rev. David Hutchinson Massy Hutchinson, Esq; John Hyde, Efq. M. P. Mr Timothy Hynes

ćś

UT-

1

Miss Mary Jackson
Mrs Jackson
Mr Jameson
Mr John Jaques
Miss Jones
Mr Thomas Jones
Mr William Jones
Mr Edward Irwin

K.

Francis Kearney, Esq; Mr Michael Kearney Mr Richard Kellet Mrs Deborah Kellet Edmond Knapp, Esq;

L

Miss Margaret Labat Mr John Baptift Langlois Anthony Lane, Efq; Mr Robert Lane Mr John Lapp Mrs Lapp Miss Lapp Hugh Lawton, Efq; Mr Peter Laulhe Mr Robert Leicester Miss Leslie Mr James Lombard Richard Lombard, Efq; Miss Longchamps Richard Longfield, Efq; Mr Jasper Lucas John Lucas, Efq; Nicholas Lyfaght, Efq; Hon. Joseph Lysaght, M. P. and Collector of Cork

M

Mr Reuben Mc. Carthy Rev. Mr John Madras Mr John Maher Mr John Mainauduc

b :

Mr Daniel Malenoir Henry Mannix, Esq. Bar- Rev. Archdeacon Oliver rifter at Law. Rev. Mr Edward Marshall, Mr Thomas Owgan Chap, to the 27th Foot. Alderman Samuel Maylor Mr Christopher Meyer Hugh Millerd, Elq; Stephen Mills, Efq; Mr Stephen Minton Rev. Mr. James Mockler Mr Thomas Moore Mr Richard Moore, B. A. T. C. D. Captain Gerard Moore

Mrs Jane Morgan Mr Jonathan Morgan Abraham Morris, Efg; Mr Ebenezar Morrison Mr John Morrison

Pierce Nagle, Efg; John Nettles, Efq; John Newman, Efq; Collector of Kinfale Adam Newman, Efq; Miss Newth Mr William Norcott

Mr Henry O'Brien Mr Terence O'Brien Cor. O'Callaghan, Efq; Cor. O'Callaghan, jun. Efq;

Mr Thadee O'Drifcoll Mr Thomas Ottiwell

Miss Parks Mr John Peddar Mr Cooper Penrofe Mr Daniel Perdriau Col. Parke Pepper William Perry Efq; Richard Perry Efq; Mrs Perry of Woodrooff Miss Perry Mr. Vesian Pick George Piercy Efq; Paul Piercy Efq; Jeffery Piercy, Efq; James Piercy Efq; Mr Henry Pierd of Caftle Lyons George Pigott Efq; William Brabazon Ponfonby, Efq; M. P. Rev. Giles Powell Mr Barry Powell Mr Richard Purcell

Mr Job Hart Price James Purcell, Efg: Mr Goodwin Purcell Miss Ellen Purcell

Mrs Grace Purcell

fter at Law.

George Purdon Esq;

Henry Puxley Efq; Barn

R

Mr William Raynes George Reed, Efq; Mr Patrick Regan Mr Patrick Reynolds Mifs Rickotts Mrs Rickotts Mr William Rickotts Michael Roberts Efq; Mr Randall Roberts Mr Richard Roberts Mrs Roberts Mrs Watkins Roberts Edmond Roche Efq; Edward Roche, Efq; Joseph Rogers Esq; Mr Francis Rowland Rev. Mr Rowlet John Rye Efq; off

aftle

Pon-

S
St. Leger St. Leger, Esq;
Capt. Charles Savage, 61st Regiment of Foot
Hibernia Scot, Esq;
Mr Edward Scott
Mr John Shea
John Simpson, Esq;
Mr William Skeys
William Snow, Esq;
Thomas Spires, Esq;
John Spread Esq; of Forrest
Mrs Spread
Capt. William Spread 7
Books

Sampson Stawell Esq; George Stawell, Esq; Mr Robert Stevelly Miss Sarah Stevelly Thomas Strettel, Esq, Benjamin Sullivan, Esq; Mrs Sweete

T
Miss Terry
Mr Henry Terry
Mr George Terry
Mr John Thompson
Edward Townshend Esq;
Mr John Traverse
Walter Travers Esq;
Mr Thomas Tuckey
Mr Wm Turpin of Dameftreet Dublin

Mr Watkins Wm. Verling Mr. William Vowel

W

Mr Thomas Walker of Dublin
John Wallis, Efq;
Henry Wallis Efq;
Mr Stephen Walth
Robert Warren Efq;
Wefthrop Watkins Efq;
James Welch Efq;
Mr John Weeks
MilbourneWeft, Efq;
Mr Francis Wheeler

Mr Thomas White, Book- Nicholas Wrixon, Efe: feller, 14 Books. Miss Sarah Widenham of Henry Wrixon of Blossom Limerick Mr Benjamin Williamson William Wilson, Esq; Bar- Barry Yelverton, Esq; Barrifter at Law, and M. P.

Mr Nicholas Wrixon fort, Efq:

rifter at Law.

MR. PETER GUITTON having met fuch Encouragement fince he has commenced teaching FRENCH in the City of Cork, as demands his public Acknowledgements. The Method he practices, is the same which was followed in this City, by the late Monsieur Bollomer, who received the public Applause for expediting Scholars both in reading, translating, and speaking with propriety and elegance. The progress Mr. Guir-Ton's Scholars have already made, he hopes will be his future Recommendation, as he means to use every Method to deserve it.

His Price for Boarders is Twenty Pounds per Annum, and Half a Guinea Enterance. Those who come to his School as Day Scholars, One Guinea per Quarter, and half a Guinea Enterance. Attending Abroad, (three times per Week) half at Guinea per Month, and half a Guinea Enterance.

THE

PREFACE.

THE TRANSLAT OR does not mean to trouble his Readers with a long Preface concerning the Work; nor endeavour to obviate any Criticisms which can be made on it. The good natured Reader, if his heart should be affected with the various misfortunes and disappointments of the hero of this history, will be inclined to pardon many faults, for the pleasure, it is hoped, he will receive from the sincerest union, which subsisted between Hypolitus and Julia.

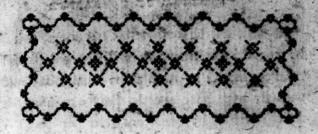

WITH diffidence he began the talk; with fear, with labour, and repeated touches, has he profecuted this piece. As to the merit of the attempt, be has very little to fay; that will be determined by the judgment of the public. He can only alledge that he has endeavoured, to the utmost of his power, to do justice to the spirit of the original.

HE cannot conclude this preface without returning thanks to those Ladies and Gentlemen who have been pleased to savour him with their subscriptions; many of whom, from motives of friendship, have exerted themselves with a warmth that does honour to their characters, and others have subscribed in so generous a manner, that he might be charged with ingratitude, was he not thus publicly to acknowledge the savours he has received.

de am du o s el l

THE

THE

HISTORY

rho

b-

d

hat

ave

ght

hus

re-

HE

HYPOLITUS

EARL of DOUGLAS.

N the reign of HENRY VII. king of England, GEORGE DE NEUELLI, count de Burgen, was unfortunately fuspected of being concerned in the criminal conduct of EDMOND DE LA POOLE; the king caused him to be arrested and confined in the tower of London; he remained there a long time, but his innocence being clearly proved, he at last obtained his liberty.

*

So

E

C

So little did he deserve this treatment, that if he could with honour have disengaged himself from the service he owed to his country, he would willingly have gone over to France to insure his safety; but as he could not form any plausible pretence for so doing, he resolved, at least, to have Roger earl of Warwick, his brother's son, (whose father was just dead, and had left him his guardian) educated in that kingdom.

HE found an opportunity of sending him to France, that seemed very favourable, which he took care not to lose. HENRY VIII. was now on the throne; his fister MARY was an extraordinary beauty; but be had no mind she should marry, for though this young princes had been demanded by many sovereign princes, he always, very artfully, found means to refuse them; but the duke de Longueville, having been taken prisoner by HENRY, at the battle of Spurs, he made proposals to the court of England to marry her to Lewis XII.

THE king of England received this proposal with great marks of joy, and the king of France was so charmed with the picture of this princess, that he sent the general of Normandy over to England.

England, who in a fortnight concluded the marriage, made a peace, and foon after conducted the princess to Boulogne.

MR. DE BURGEN prayed her to permit the earl of Warwick to accompany her at her departure from London; she took him as one of her pages of honour, and though he was but eleven years old, he was not one of the least remarkable in her train.

THE king fent the count D'ANGOULEME to receive the princess, and marry her in his name. This prince who was perfectly well made, acquitted himself of his commission with so much gallantry and spirit, that the young queen on seeing him, heaved a figh, and fecretly bewailed her fate in not being destined for such an agreeable partner. As to the count he found her fo lovely and fo charming, that he felt in himself the same emotion with which he had inspired her : and he would have carried his passion to greater lengths, but for the advice of his friend DUPRAT. His reasons indeed were strong on the side of interest, and policy, but as he saw that the prince despised them, and was too agreeably attached, to fuffer himself te be persuaded, he discovered to him the intrigue intrigue between the new queen and the duke of SUFFOLK, which effectually cured him.

The king waited the arrival of the queen at Abbeville, where the marriage was celebrated with great pomp and magnificence: but fix weeks after his return to Paris, he died in his palace of Tournelles. The queen having declared herself not pregnant, and the count D'Angouleme being now king, under the title of Francis I. promised to marry her to the duke of Suffolk, and soon after she set out on her return to England.

The earl of Warwick remained in France by his uncle's orders. The king appointed him to the same post he had the honour to fill under queen Mary, and he was present at the interview between the kings of England and France. These monarchs met between Ardres and Guines. They were without dispute, two of the most accomplished

This young widow was privately married to CHARLES BRANDON, duke of Suffolk. HEN-RY at first seemed displeased at her choice, but was soon reconciled, and inviting them home, they were publickly married at Greenwich.

t

S

f

lf

-

)-

1-

y

to er

W

ese

ey

med

to

N-

out

ley

plished and gallant princes in the world; their court was also the grandest and most magnificent that ever was seen. They caused tournaments and courses to be exhibited in honour of the ladies: people of the first quality came from all parts to be present at the entertainments of two such great kings, and the camp between Ardres and Guines, was called the camp of gold cloth.

Among the many ladies who appeared at this festival, the countess de Lorge, had the pleasure to fee that the respect and admiration of the court were not divided, and that mis MONT-GOMERY; her daughter, bore away the prize of beauty from all the ladies of the court. The earl of WARWICK, then only fifteen years old, became so much in love with this charming creature, that he was like to die with grief, when Mr. de BURGEN, told him that the king had given him orders to bring him back to England, and that he was going to return thanks to the king of France for his great goodness to him. He could neither resist the commands of HENRY, or the will of his uncle, and notwithstanding his despair, he was obliged to obey the orders of his superiors without finding an opportunity to declare his love to he who was the cause of it.

He embarked with the king of England, and carried with him such a deep and tender impression of the charms of miss Montgomery, that he did not enjoy one tranquil moment since his departure from her.

Mean while those two remarkable monarchs separated, so well pleased with each other, that nothing was spoke of but the unity and magnificence which had passed at their interview. Amongst the English nobility who made the grandest appearance, the duke of Buckingham was the most remarkable; but cardinal Wolsey, the king's favourite, having heard before his departure from London, that the duke had greatly murmured at a journey, which to him appeared so useless and expensive, he for very particular motives resolved on his ruin.

Accordingly on the king's return, Wolsey accused him of having conspired against his perfon and kingdom. The king surprized and irritated, ordered him to be sent for to justify himself; but no sooner was he arrived, than he was arrested, together with the count de Burgen his son-in-law, and though he was innocent, the cardinal

dinal had his desired satisfaction, and the unfortunate duke lost his head on a scassfold. The count de Burgen obtained his liberty, after a few months imprisonment, but his estate was consscated.

Such terrible misfortunes obliged him to fend the earl of WARWICK back to France, as he feared the king's inflexibility, or rather his blindness in believing every thing the cardinal would offer to the prejudice of his family, and dreading thereby that they may be involved a new. He therefore took the liberty of writing to FRANcis I. befeeching him to honour his nephew with a continuance of his protection. The king received him with marks of great goodness; and the young earl, whose ideas were ever filled with the image of mis MONTGOMERY, was transported with joy to find her at court, as one of the maids of honour to the queen. His whole fludy was how to please her. She alone engaged his emon and to stemarif account attention

8

e

7

đ

T

Y

r-

t-1-

as

f-

al

The duke of BUCKINGHAM fell a facrifice to the cardinal's pride and refentment, being beheaded on Tower-hill, the 17th of May, 1521, for a pretended crime.

attention, and he with justice flattered himself, that his perseverance would at last meet with a tender return from this lovely maid.

ABOUT this time cardinal Wolsey employed all his policy to be revenged of the emperor, by promoting the marriage of his mafter with the princess MARGARET of France; but love was endeavouring to destroy part of his schemes, the king being much enamoured with ANNE BULLEN daughter to fir THOMAS BULLEN, she came to France in quality of maid of honor to queen Maav, when the married Lewis XII. but on returning foon after to England, her great beauty, together with a lively wit and delicate fentiments, so captivated HENRY, that he could no longer live without her. All his happiness consisted in pleasing her, and the resistance she made to his desires, caused him to resolve on marrying her. To effect this, he did every thing in his power to make the POPE break his marriage with queen CATHERINE, and the firmness of the pontiff in refusing him such an unjust demand, irritated him to fuch a degree, that it finally proved the cause of the ruin of the popish religion in England. o der a sit distribution of the hearth

HENRY went to Boulogne, where FRANCIS I. came with the princes his children. Here they gave each other mutual affurances of a fincere friendship. The real motive of Henry's journey was to complain to the king of France, of the Pope's proceeding, and to persuade him to send in both their names to the Pope to summon a council of his clergy.

Ì

Mean while the earl of Warwick by his cares and assiduities obtained leave of his fair mistress, whose entire dependance was on the queen (the countess de Lorge her mother being dead) to ask their majesties consent to marry her, as he was of an age to be no longer under the guardianship of his relations. This alliance was so much to his advantage that every one shared in his joy; and he easily obtained from their majesties a blessing which seemed to him preferable to all others. The nuptials were solemnized at Calais, and nothing could exceed its magnificence: The two kings loaded this illustrious pair with konours and riches; and they accompanied Henery to England.

HENRY'S love for ANNE BULLEN encreased

in proportion to the obstacles it met with, but at last he married her, and she was crowned at Westminster, but when he found that the sentence given at ROME by, the POPE had been iffued against him he became furious; he declared himfelf to be the head of the church of England and was at last the persecutor of those he had loved most. Persons of each sex and quality, were every day put to death on account of their religion; his anger went fo far as to profane even the very relicks and he caused those of St. Thomas of Can-TERBURY to be burned. HENRY COURTNEY marquis of Exeter, HENRY POLE brother to the' cardinal of that name, and fir EDWARD NEVIL annimated by their zeal, and willing to make the king sensible of his error, lost their heads for their prefumption, and the earl of WARWICK being a near relation of fir EDWARD NEVIL's was accufed of having murmured in fuch difrespectful words, that though innocent, he was obliged to quit the kingdom immediately, in order to avoid a shameful death.

Those of his family who remained at court, fearing more the loss of their lives and estates, than that of their soul or honour, conformed to the king's orders with a base and servile submission.

They

They embraced his religion, and became by policy the greatest enemies to the earl of Warwick, his estate being consiscated; but what troubled him more than all his misfortunes was, his being obliged to part from one of the most beautiful, and virtuous wives in the world. He left with her a daughter named Julia, who was but two years old, and after having with the utmost tenderness, recommended to her greatest care, that precious pledge of their mutual love, told her he was resolved to go to Venice, that the Pope, the Emperor, and the Venetians had made a league against Solyman, and that it was the only place to acquire immortal honour, or find a glorious death.

THE countess of WARWICK was ready to expire with grief at her dear lord's departute, nor would she employ the power she had over him to cause his delay: the danger he was exposed to in remaining with her, having caused in her a thousand alarms; she saw very well he could never hope for a settlement in his own country, on account of the impediments which his religion threw in the way; and as he was of an age when every man of the least spirit would reproach him-

les, without tay of

felf for passing his days in ease and indolence, his virtue and courage soon overcame his love.

He arrived at Venice after a short and pleasant passage, and was received by general Capello with particular marks of esteem, because the earl's family was well known to him. They embarked for Corfu in order to join the Pope and the king of Spain's gallies. When all the commanders were assembled, they resolved upon going to Prevesa, to seek their enemies; Solyman when he heard this news was surprized at the diligence of the consederates, and was doubtful what course to take; but the intrepid Barbarossa determined by some great exploit, to make up for the loss he sustained in his retreat from Corfu.

GENERAL CAPELLO commanded the front line, and at first sight of the Turkish sleet, annimated by a noble emulation, he pressed forward with his division, which caused the enemy to retire. Prince Doria seeing the advantage which the Venetian general had gained, advanced with his sleet, which made the other generals conclude he intended to attack the enemy; but he stopped on a sudden, without any one's being able to guest

13

nt

0

re

T-

be

Π-

0-

N

li-

in 1-te

m

nt

ni-

rd

e-ch

th

de

ed

es he the reason of it, and having collected the gallies of his squadron retired to a neighbouring cape.

THE other generals being greatly displeased at this proceeding spoke against the prince with great bitterness, and the wind having abated all at once, the Turks came out of the gulph and offered them battle, but the irrefolution and delay of the Christians prevented their accepting it. ROSSA and the famous corfair DRAGUT RAIS had time to gain the shore, and the confederate fleet remained motionless, regretting the fine opportunity they had loft. While general CAPEL-Lo, and the patriarch GRIMANI fired with fhame and anger, went on board a frigate to feek prince Doria, whom they befought to improve the advantages which fortune had thus thrown in their way. Come my lord, come cried the generous VENETIAN, let us go where glory calls, and attack our enemies who being almost vanquished, confess their fear by flight; and in effect nothing was heard through the whole fleet but the shouts of the foldiers crying out " to arms, to arms, victory, victory." Prince DORIA ashamed of being the only person who retarded the event, commanded them to advance, but just when they were to all appearance appearance on the point of gaining the victory, he fhamefully retreated a second time.

MEAN while DRAGUT RAIS, attacked two Venetian gallies that remained behind, and took them. The earl of WARWICK being unfortunately on board one of these, made a resistance as much to the admiration of the Christians as surprising to the TURKS, it was impossible to make a braver defence, but his valor was at last obliged to yield to fuperior numbers. Some foldiers who had faved themselves by swimming, brought an account of his being killed; the generals, and all those who were acquainted with him in the army were extremely forry for his death; as bad news generally flies fwifter than good, and the countess of WARwick being under great anxiety which caused her to enquire for him by every opportunity, she was but too foon made fenfible of her great lofs.

This virtuous woman was at first so overwhelmed with grief that she thought her last hour approaching, and having now no longer attachment to this world since her dear lord's death, she only regretted the leaving behind her her dear Julia. This lovely infant was only two years old, and tho' so young promised to be every thing that could be expected expected from so apt a child, her afflicted mother took her in her arms, and bedewed her face with tears, "Omy dear Julia," cried she, "O my "child, what will be thy destiny, who will now "be a father to thee, or who a mother, thy father is no more! and thy mother is dying. Alas! "I leave thee at a time when thou hast most "need of me, but I trust that Providence will take "all the necessary care to save thee from the "dangers to which thou art going to be exposed." In ending these words, she cast her eyes towards heaven, imploring its protection for this dear little innocent.

WHILE she remained in this melancholy situation, the earl of Douglas, and his lady, came to visit her at her country seat, which she never quitted since her lord's departure. They were persons of great merit, and her best friends. The family of Montgomery were related to that of Douglas, which was one of the most illustrious in Scotland; but some private discontentments, obliged the earl of Douglas to leave Scotland, and come and live in England, where he married lady Bedford, who had a great deal of wit, and merit, and they were both much esteemed by the king.

As foon as they faw the counters of Warwick, fighs and tears for some time, prevented their speaking, being seized with a most sincere forrow; and the dangerous situation which they saw their dear friend in, served to encrease it.

AT last the earl striving to suppress his tears, faid every thing he thought might, if not comfort her, at least alleviate her grief. The fick countess laying her hand on her heart, sobbed most bitterly, and uttered complaints sufficient to melt the most insensible persons, " Ah! my lord," said she, " the stroke is here, it is impossible I should " ever recaver, let us, I beseech you, lose no " time, for in my present situation the moments " are very precious; but it feems, madam, con-" tinued she, addressing herself to the countess of " Douglas, as if Providence had sent your la-" dyship to contribute to my repose--- I have one " favour to ask, which if your ladyship will be so " kind to grant, I shall die satisfied, as I know " you both to be fo good and generous, that I " dare hope you will not refuse me." " No cer-" tainly, madam," replied they with eagerness wyou-may rely on us, and be affured we shall make

d

e

7

3,

t

İt

d

d

0

.

f

e

I

" make no difficulty in ferving your ladyship; " therefore, you may explain yourfelf with an " entire assurance of being obeyed in all your de-" fires." " Alas!" refumed the countess of WAR-WICK, " in what manner shall I express my gra-" titude; but fince you defire to know my re-" quest, I beseech you take my dear child and " educate her as your own: this poor infant will " lose her all in losing me; and she is, if not suc-" coured by you, in danger of falling into the " hands of her uncles, who to keep in favour with the king, will educate her in the protestant " religion. I am convinced of your zeal for our " religion; and though time may make you for-" get the friendship you have had for my late lord, " as well as that which you just now expressed " for my daughter, yet this one consideration of " her being brought up in your religion, makes " me hope you will endeavour to conceal her " birth, and make her pass for your own daugh-" ter. I have the honour of being related to you. " and do not look upon you as a subject to the " king; his anger cannot be extended to subjects " of Scotland; for which reason, you, my lord, " are the only person to whom I can with safety " confide my little innocent."

B 3

THE

The earl of Douglas said every thing that could be expected from a generous man, a good parent, and saithful friend. The countess also assured her, that the little Julia should enjoy a share in her affections with Hypolitus and Lucilla, her own children.

"I want words to express what I feel," replied the counters of WARWICK, " and know not in what manner to thank you for such pressing obligations. I accept, madam, for my dear child, the protection you so kindly promised; and I shall put into your hands what jewels I have, that she may use them at a proper time; but do not, I beseech you, think but that I am considered fident of your sincerity in the care of them, as well as in her education, being well assured you will not omit any thing that may either adorn her mind or person."

In speaking these words, she took a small cabibinet that stood by her bed-side, which contained her jewels, worth about six thousand guineas, and giving them to the countess of Douglas, "there, " said she, is all I have remaining of a pretty large fortune——A mere trisse," continued she, dropping nt

bo

£-

y-

ed

in

b-

d,

I

e, ıt

1-

u

.

dropping some tears, " for a child of her birth, " and one who I believe will not want a generous " spirit; but as the most solid wealth consists in being virtuous, I hope she will always be sufficiently rich, at least she cannot want that most " essential ornament, when educated under your " ladyship's care.

"When she is of an age fit to be entrusted with the secret of her birth, tell her, I beseech you, whose child she is; shew her her father's picture and mine, which I now give you; let her know our great tenderness for her, and make her pay the same regard to our memory she would have had for ourselves, had not the Almighty taken us to his mercy."

HAVING thus spoke, her eyes bathed in tears, she several times embraced her dear daughter, and throwing her arms round the countess of Dove-LAS's neck, they servently embraced each other, and took a last and tender farewell. "It is time you should leave me," said the countess in a feeble voice, "it will be late before you armive in London, and though your presence was a very great consolation to me, yet we must part.

" part. I find myfelf growing very faint, there" fore, will make use of the little time left me, in preparing for the greatest of all journies."

LORD and lady Douglas were fo much grieved that they melted into tears, without being able to fpeak, and could not think of leaving her in that fituation. But the dear dying lady WAR-WICE, having a most admirable presence of mind, told them how uneafy she was in regard to her daughter's being conveyed to them, without the knowledge of her domestics, as she feared if any of them should by chance discover that her daughter was in their care, they might let her uncles know where she was concealed; but having confidered for some time, she bethought herself of her chaplain, who was a gentleman of inviolable fecrecy: fhe told them fhe would leave the entire business to his management. And, she added, that by means of her nurse's daughter, who was a perfon in whom she could confide, would cause to be reported that the child had died fuddenly.

HAVING taken all these precautions, lord and lady Douglas once more repeated every thing they imagined might serve to quiet her thoughts

in

4

g

T

in regard to her lovely child, and they parted from this virtuous lady in great grief at her being fo near her end. They feldom fent to know how she was, for fear their over carefulness should be suspected by the uncles; but five days after, the chaplain sent them an account of her death, and of the place to which he had secretly conveyed her daughter.

THE countess of Douglas immediately seat for the child, and acted with so much precaution as to keep it a prosound secret from the servants of her family; and what made the deception the less difficult was, her having a little before this, a daughter nursed in the country who was of the same age as Julia, and she being lately dead, Julia was made to pass for her.

WHEN she was brought into her mother's appartments, (so we must now call the counters of Douglas) Hypolitus happened to be be present; he was one of the handsomest and liveliest of children, and appeared quite charmed with his sister Julia. Lucilla who was four years old, seemed nothing to him in comparison to Julia. He could scarce ever be a moment from her, and during his childhood, when nature alone is supposed.

hi

posed to govern, he felt in his little heart such a violent regard for her, that all his attention was to please her.

Ir must however be confessed that she was altogether a most lovely creature, and it was imposfible to behold a person more persect both in body and mind; at twelve years old she passed for a miracle of beauty: her stature was inclining to be tall, her presence noble, full of sweetness and modefty, her eyes full and black, but of fuch a luftre that it was difficult to withstand their glances, her mouth was finall, but of a lovely red, her teeth admirable, her complexion was fair beyond description, and animated with the finest glow of health imaginable; her flaxen hair falling in natural ringlets to her dender waift encreased her charms, and there were very few women that had fo fine a neck, or limbs fo delicately formed as her's. She walked majestic, danced most gracefully, and fung with fo much judgment, that she attracted, without delign, the admiration of all that faw her.

HYPOLITUS for a man, was as perfect as Ju-LIA for a woman, his shape, his features, his noble and majestic air, his politeness, wit, and behaviour, haviour, all which were fo liberally bestowed on him by nature, that it was impossible to see him with indifference. LUCILLA had a great deal of wit and vivacity; she was superior to most women in beauty, and was furpassed only by her fifter. Hypolitus and she, thought Julia was their fifter, and they lived together in the most tender friendship; but at last Hypolitus began to appear melancholy; Julia also became thoughtful, they chose to be for ever together, and fought each other constantly; but when they met. they faid little, and endeavoured to stifle a rifing passion; they passed whole hours in viewing each other with a languishing air; they abandoned themselves to this innocent pleasure, 'till growing thoughtful on a fudden, with blufhing cheeks, and eyes cast down they fell into a profound meditation.

Mean time the days seemed to them much too short to gratify their desire of seeing each other and when they separated, sound that all their pleasure consisted in being together. Lucilla who was of a sprightly disposition, used often to rally them on this account: "Brother," said she to Hypolitus, "you love my sister better than

"you do me, and as I am the eldest I ought to be jealous; but I must confess she is worthy of the regard you have for her, and though I love you to my very heart, methinks she loves you better, than I." "Do not think so, my dear brother," cried Julia, blushing, "we love you both alike." "And why, my dear sister," replied Hypolitus, "why do you oppose the pleasure I take in hearing it said that you love me." Then Julia sinding herself embarressed, remained silent, and relapsed again into her usual melancholy; and as to Hypolitus he seemed at a loss and entirely overcome with vexation, while Lucilla viewed them with surprize, not knowing what to think.

ONE day when the earl of Douglas and all his family were at Buckingham, where he had a very fine feat, it happened that as Julia, her brother and fifter, were walking at the fide of a lake, fine-feemed defirous of passing over to an island which was in the midst of it, where sheds had been made to keep swans; as soon as she had expressed her defire, Hypolitus ran towards the place where a little boat was kept tied to the foot of a tree, which having untied, he brought it to the place where his fifters were, who entered it along with him, but he not having skill enough to conduct it to the island, entangled the boat in a tust of reeds, which being perceived by his sisters, they were so much afraid on seeing the boat lean to one side, that going hastily to the other, it overset, and they were like to be drowned.

LUCILLA had the good fortune to meet with affiftance. Hypolitus might eafily have avoided this danger had he been alone, but the thought of his dear Julia's being drowned, so terrified him, he scarce knew what he did: his fear adding to his ftrength, he feized her by her cloaths, and never quitted them 'till he brought her to the island, which was not far off. But who can express his grief when he saw her eyes closed; a mortal paleness having overspread her lovely face, and that she remained without sense or motion. he doubted not but she was dead. " Ah! how " unfortunate I am," cried he, " in being the " cause of my dear sister's death, who perhaps " funk to the bottom before I had the power to " affift her. Julia, my dear Julia, what will " become of me." In speaking these words he pressed her in his arms, and putting his mouth clofe close to her's was ready to expire with grief; but his tender fighs, and the deluge of tears with which he bedewed her face, soon brought her from a state, into which her fears alone, had thrown her.

Ar last she opened her eyes, and fixing them on Hypolitus, who at that moment began to recover himself. "How afflicted you seem, my dear brother," said she, "do you think I deserve to be so much lamented, or that my life is so very precious?" "Ah! my dear sister," cried he, embracing her, "never tell me of parting, if you were to know what I have just now suffered, you would pity me."

SHE was just going to reply, when they perceived a small boat coming towards them; being sent by the earl to bring them from the island. He very fortunately passed near that place, just as the boat was overset; and if he had not caused Lucilla to be immediately taken up, she would inevitably have been drowned; for though her brother loved her, with a real tenderness, yet his attention was so much engaged by Julia that he never once thought of Lucilla.

WHER

at

th

er

ad

an

e-

y

fe

When they returned, lord and lady Douglas, reprimanded them very sharply for exposing themfelves in that manner; and Lucilla resented the indifference her brother had shewn for her safety, "Indeed," said she, "it was no great matter "what became of me, for when my sister is prefent, she is always sure of my brother's protection; but as to me I know too well what I "have to depend on."

THESE reproaches chagrined the brother and fifter; it also served to open the eyes of lord and lady Douglas, and made them observe the young lovers with more attention. They looked on each other, and feemed a little disconcerted, as they had long intended to marry Hypolitus to a grand daughter of the earl of ARGYLE, lord chamberlain to the king; she was a very rich heirefs, and had been educated in Edinburgh. As they were nearly related, the earl of DougLAS resolved to send his son in a short time to see his intended mistress, and endeavour to gain her affections; he also designed to marry Julia to the earl of BEDFORD, who was related to lady Dou-GLAS, and was deeply in love with this charming maid.

THE earl of Douglas and his lady when alone, discoursed on what had passed: " How is " this," faid they, " is it possible that HYPOLI-" TUS can have other fentiments for JULIA, than " those of a brother to a fifter!" They then recalled to their remembrance feveral instances of their behaviour; and the countess resolved to fpeak to Julia, without feeming to take notice of what she had seen. She went one morning into her daughters apartment, and feeing Hypoli-TUS kneeling at the fide of JULIA's bed, who was not yet rifen, "You are very early in your " visits," said she to him, in a severe tone, " when " you should be employed rather at your studies, " than be for ever in your fifters apartments." HYPOLITUS retired with a look full of grief, and the counters addressing herfelf to her daughters, told them, that though it was their duty to love their brother, and was what she commanded them to do by all the authority she had, yet, she did not think it proper, now that they were grown almost women, to live in fo great familiarity; that though she always wished them to be united, yet it did not prevent them from being discreet. Ly-CILLA promised her ladyship she would obey her;

but

bu

Te

th

it

b

but JULIA cast down her eyes and blushed, this reprimand having encreased her melancholy, and though she took all possible care to conceal it, yet it was impossible not to observe it.

SHE remained part of the day in her closet, and being at her window in the evening, faw the earl of BEDFORD alight from his chariot; his presence at any time was disagreeable to her, but now it feemed insupportable; this obliged her to go down to the garden, which was very large, and haften to gain a fmall wood at the end of it, but fearing they would feek for her there, she entered a grotto, no less agreeable for its coolness, than remarkable for the beauty and variety of the shells with which it was composed; on the infide were small banks of green turf, covered with moss, whose freshness and verdure were easily preserved, because they were never exposed to the scorching heat of the fun. An agreeable obscurity reigned in this grotto, and here it was the fair Julia chose to abandon herself to bitter resections. And HYPOLITUS, led by his displeasure, sought also in this place an afylum from feveral persons of quality that came to visit his father, but as he was not in a humour to entertain them, thought it best to retire to this retreat.

46

HE fat down without feeing his fifter, leaning his head against a rock, from whence gushed a large quantity of water, which multiplied into a thoufand falls; he remained a long time like a man whose heart was torn with grief, but at last raising his voice on a sudden, " Julia, my dear Ju-" LIA," cried he, " fince my passion for thee " is not lawful, fince I commit a crime in " adoring you, and that it is much easier for me " to cease to live than cease to love thee. I will " this moment put an end to my wretched being, " and die innocent of a flame I cannot extin-" guish." In speaking these words he drew his fword, and was turning the point towards his breaft, when JULIA, quite aftonished with fear, uttered a loud shriek, " Ah! my brother," said she, holding his arm, " whence comes this desor pair, is it possible your grief should tempt you " to commit fuch a dreadful crime," Hyport-Tus surprized, fell motionless at her feet, but having recovered himself, after a pretty long silence, " My dearest sister," said he, " I am no " longer mafter of my fecret, fince you have just " now discovered it; but what surprizes me is, " that knowing as you do, the cause of my despair,

is

ge

1-

n

g

"despair, you have yet so much pity for me as to wish me to live. I do not deserve it, my dear "Julia, and though my crime is involuntary, yet I have omitted nothing to endeavour to conquer my passion, and bring it within due bounds; the satal planet under which I am born, has so strongly opposed my cure, that no longer doubting my misfortune would be perpetual, I came to seek a violent remedy, when you at that moment prevented me."

"Alas!" replied Julia, "alas! my brother, those cruel stars which you complain of, are not more favourable to me; but know now all my misfortunes as well as thine. Yes, Hypolitus, I love you—and love you too much, fince you are my brother. I tell you this to engage your compassion, as you have all mine, and let you know I am resolved never to see you more. Yes, my dear brother, I will go to France and be a nun, and there conceal my shame and griefs from the world. I could wish they were even unknown to you, my Hypolitus; but it is impossible in the situation you are to deny you this consolation."

and

ten

fel

it

of

he

fh

fa

g

le

HYPOLITUS was fo transported at hearing his dear JULIA speak in this manner, that he was almost frantic with grief, and being yet at her feet, he cast his eyes up to her's, and viewing her with a look full of anguish, " I oppose not," said he, " fo generous a resolution, whatever pain the lo-" fing you for ever may cost me, it will at least " be some consolation to me, when I reflect you " will not be the earl of BEDFORD's wife," " And " would you," cried she, " have me marry any " other person?" " Alas! my fifter," cried he, " do not ask me to explain myself any " more on this subject; but be assured on my " part, that I shall never change my condition; " and fince there is a necessity for our parting, I " shall lead such a sad and melancholy life, that " must soon end my torments."

Julia answered only by sighs, and both melted into tears. "Brother," said she, looking on him with inexpressible tenderness, "I must leave you, "and perhaps shall never see you more; let us "therefore endeavour to conceal our missfortunes "from the whole world, and if it is possible, from "ourselves." In speaking these words, she arose and and left the grotto, without daring to look on Hy-POLITUS, who saw her depart and could not attempt to prevent her.

THE dejection of spirits in which she found herfelf, made her resolve not to visit the countess' till it was late, fearing she should meet the eastof Bedford, which would only serve to encrease her trouble, by seeing a declared lover, for whom she had not the least inclination. However he saw her, and she was particularly careful not to give him the least opportunity to entertain her alone, and he returned the same evening to London.

JULIA passed but a very indifferent night; she could not sufficiently wonder at her brother's sentiments, and her own. "My God," cried she, sobbing most bitterly, "what have we done to "deserve, in such a tender age, so great a pu-"nishment." She arose early next morning, and knowing the countess was in her closet, she went to her trembling, and fell on her knees before her; this action surprised her ladyship, who asked her with a tender accent, what she would have, and why she addressed her in that humble posture? "Madam," replied Julia, "I have one favour "to ask of your ladyship, which I humbly hope "you

COT

"you will not refuse me. I am fifteen years old, and your ladyship's youngest child, I do not expect a great fortune, nor do I feel the least inclination for the world, but I have a great defire to be a nun. Therefore, madam, if this choice does not displease your ladyship, I conjure you to consent to my desire, and request you will be so good to prevail on my father to conduct me himself to a convent, or permit you madam to do it."

"My dear child," faid the countess tenderly, have you seriously reflected on the proposal you have now made me? it would be dreadful to take a wrong step, and you are so very young that you ought to take time to consider of an affair of such consequence." Julia, continued to affure her ladyship, with great resolution, that she had already reflected on it, and believed she never would repent her choice. Lady Douglas affured her she would do all in her power to make her lord consent to it.

Accordingly she went immediately to his lordship's apartment, and told him she had good reasons to believe that Hypolitus, and Julia were not in love with each other, "the poor cild," continued

ď,

X-

1-

2-

is

continued she, "has quite other notions, she wish"es to be a nun, and I come to consult with you how we shall act in this affair; and she desires either you or I should conduct her to a convent in France."

"I do not think," replied Lord Douglas,
"we have any authority to refuse her this gratifi"cation; and in case she goes, it is your ladyship
"that must conduct her thither: but I think it
"highly proper that we first let her know who
"her parents were, as the countess of War"wick requested us, and according to the pro"mise we made to her chaplain, to whom she
"intrusted Julia to place her with us."

LADY DOUGLAS approved very much of this thought, and observing that Julia seemed troubled, she called her to her apartments, and told her, that she and her father desired nothing more than her felicity, and that he had granted her request; " and it is I" continued she, " that will be your conductress; though your going to a conwent will give us great concern." Julia expressed her gratitude with great tenderness, and having thanked her ladyship, she retired.

WHEN she returned to her chamber, LUCILLA told her that HYPOLITUS waited for her in her closet. "He is so greatly altered," added she, "that I fear something is the matter with him, "you, my dear sister, are his consident, therefore, "I beseech you, to give him all the consolation "in your power, as he seems very much afflicted."

JULIA who was greatly moved at the interview The had with her mother, was much more fo at what LUCILLA told her; and entering her closet found Hypolitus lying on a couch, his face covered with an handkerchief; as foon as he faw her, he attempted to rife, but his strength failing him, he fell back on the couch. JULIA approached him, and taking his hand, which she pressed between her's, looked on him for some time, her eyes bathed in tears, " Brother," faid she, after a short filence, " your melancholy situation over-" whelms me with grief; I am myself unfortu-" nate enough without adding fresh grievances to " those I already fuffer. Alas! HYPOLITUS! " you are no more like the same person, you will " die when I wish you would live. I request in " " Ah! my fifter, cried " the name ofhe, he, interrupting her, "do not make use of your power in persuading me to live, but rather think on the loss I am to suffer, since it is not permitted me to oppose you, and must not even wish to see you; consider well of this, and let me quickly die, it being the only remedy that can end my missfortunes." "My dear brother," returned Julia, "your reason will recall you to your duty, and you will forget me when I am gone." Hypolitus snatched away his hand, which she continued to hold between her's without making any answer.

SHE waited some time, but finding he kept a fullen silence, "Wherefore, my dear brother, is "this," said she, "methinks you are in despair, "and will not even speak to me; do you not think I deserve your pity, and that this is not a "great violence to my inclinations?" He yet continued silent, without regarding her. "Then you "will die, my dear Hypolitus!" said she, "if "so, we will die together; I will no longer oppose it, but you must be very quick if you die "before me."

An! my fifter," cried he, fighing profoundly,

" let me be the only victim of this facrifice, and believe me you have done your duty. Live, my "adorable Julia, why should you not?" "And "why do you talk of dying?" interrupted she, in a severe tone, "Is it not your stubborness that kills "me?"

Hypolitus could no longer support her anger, but throwing himself at her seet, took her fair hands and kissed them. "Compose yourself, my dear sister," said he, "I am resolved to obey you, and to convince you of my sincerity, I will take a little food, though I was determined to starve myself to death, but I now submit entirely to your will." Julia overcome with grief, called her sister, and requested her to bring some nourishment to her brother. She would have gone herself but was not in a condition to be seen.

SHE acquainted HYPOLITUS with the converfation that passed between the countess and her; that she had promised to conduct her to France, and that she was going to prepare for her journey.

HYPOLITUS eat a little, but the same night he was taken with a most violent sever. Julia was as much grieved at it as it was possible for one in the state she was in to be, nevertheless she did not omit going to see him, and her eyes convinced him more than her words how much she was afflicted at his illness; but that which would have greatly confoled him at another time, served only to afflict him the more at present; and he would almost have preserved Julia's aversion to her tenderness. And this virtuous maid had the like sentiments for him.

THE report of her intention to become a nunwas foon made public. The most indifferent people regretted her, and were aftonished that a. person of such great beauty and accomplishments should think of shutting herself up in a convent. Among those who interested themselves most was the earl of BEDFORD. He waited on the earl of Douglas at London, where he was then with all his family; acquainted him that his paffion for Julia was the pureft, and withall fo great, that provided he gave his consent to their marriage, he defired no fortune; that his birth and riches were of themselves sufficient to make her happy, which was the utmost of his ambition! that he adored her, and if he loft the hope of poffessing her, he would be the most unfortunate of men!

THE earl of Douglas replied to this compliment in the most polite manner, but told his lordship, he should for ever reproach himself if he was to attempt persuading her against her inclination; and though the choice she made of going to a nunnery gave him infinite concern, yet he could not bring himself to oppose her desires; and finally, that as he was convinced of his lordship's esteem and friendship, both to him and his lady, if he could think of his daughter Lucilla, who was elder than Julia, and of consequence would have the greatest fortune, he would be proud of his lordship's alliance. The earl of Bedford thanked him as well as his grief would permit, and retired very much afflicted.

MEAN while the countess who had been preparing every thing for her own and Julia's departure, desired she would begin and take leave of her acquaintance, as she hoped to set out in two days.
But notwithstanding her fortitude, this lovely maid could not hear these sad orders without being greatly moved, and she first went to her brother's apartment, who yet kept his bed, with her heart ready to break, and her eyes full of tears. She fat down near him, and looking on him with an air of woe, " I am come, my dear brother," faid fhe, "I am come at last to bid you adieu for ever! " Oh! what dreadful words," continued she, " Adieu for ever !- Is it possible it can be so?" Here her groans stopped her speech, when Hy-POLITUS folding his arms, and looking up to Heaven, in a low and scarce articulate voice, thus replied: " Is it then to-day I must lose you, my " dear Tulia, and is this most formidable moment now arrived? I dare not attempt to per-" fuade you from an act which will complete the " measure of my misfortunes; but I will, if pof-" fible, endeavour to conceal from you the mi-" ferable state in which you leave me, least your " pity should triumph over your courage. " must part, my dear fister," added he, " fince " fate will have it fo. But oh! JULIA, JULIA, "why am I your brother?-

In speaking these words, he turned aside to conceal the tears which overspread his face; but Julia obliging him to look on her, "Do not, "my dear Hypolitus," cried she, "do not envy me the only consolation I have left. Let me behold all your grief, as it is impossible it " can increase mine, but rather alleviate it;

" and thou" continued she, " most rigid virtue,

" rigorous duty, and tender sensibility, which fill

" my foul with sentiments that I must disclaim,

" receive the facrifice I here make you, of all

" my passions as well as my liberty. I am now

" going to immure myself during the rest of my " life."

Having given vent to those sad complaints, she endeavoured to rise, but her strength failing her she became quite cold, and falling into an arm chair, reduced Hypolitus to a most wretched state. Her weakness did not last long; she soon recovered, and looking on her brother, who was half dead, "Adieu, my dear Hypolitus, "adieu.—I have loved you too well for your repose, and for my own. Farewell, my dear sister," replied he, embracing her, and wetting her face with his tears, "You leave me the most afflicted and most unfortunate of men, whose only hope is in a speedy death." Julia at last quitted him, and going to her own apartments went to bed.

Just heaven! what a night did this brother and fifter pass.—What a separation! what sighs! what what tears! how terrible their fituation; but it was necessary to undergo what duty required, and two such great souls were not capable of swerving from theirs.

JULIA being fatigued at having passed the night in sighs and tears, was beginning to slumber, when Isabella her woman, came and woke her, telling her the countess desired to see her. She arose in haste, and went to her ladyship's closet. The earl was with her, together with a clergyman. As soon as she entered, the countess desired her to shut the door, and causing her to sit down, "My dear child," said she, "we are now going to acquaint you with what will very much surprize you:

"You imagine yourself to be our child, and that you are so in love and tenderness is most true, but it is now time to acquaint you, that, you are only allied to us by the countess your mother, who was of the family of Montgo-mery. Here is her picture," continued she, together with that of your most illustrious father, Roger earl of Warwick, son to the earl of Salisbury, Here are jewels to the amount

" of fix thousand guineas, which your virtuous "mother entrusted to our care; and Mr. Eaton here, who was her chaplain at the time of her death, to whom I now present you, is the gentleman whom she charged with the care of putting you into our hands; it is now thirteen years since.

"THE earl of WARWICK being very zealous for his religion, found himself involved in the missortunes of a near relation, his namesake, whom the king caused to be put to death; your father to avoid the like sate, followed the great general Capello to Corfu; and in the gulph where Barbarossa commanded the whole Turkish sleet, the samous Dragut Rais who was the most formidable pirate, fought on this occasion, with two Venetian gallies, and took them; the earl of Warwick who commanded one of them, fell into the sea pierced with many wounds.

"THE countess your mother, overwhelmed with this loss, which had such an effect on her that she soon found her end approaching, and having good reasons to be apprehensive of your falling

US

N

er

1-

1.3

" falling into your uncle's power, she entrusted " you to our care, and you cannot deny that " had you been our own child, we could not have " loved you with greater tenderness. Keep, there-" fore the fecret, my dear child, (I cannot, nor " indeed ought I call you by any other name,) " and do not let it be discovered by any means, " as you fee that under our young king, our per-" fecutions are rather encreased, notwithstanding " the last commands of HENRY VIII. in our fa-" your, which were not in the least regarded. The " duke of Somerser, who is the king's uncle, " and protector of the kingdom, is much feared " and respected, which should oblige you to con-" ceal your fentiments, as well as to pay due ho-" nour and respect to the memory of those who " gave you birth."

JULIA, quite amazed, confounded and transported with joy, which she strove to conceal, rose from her seat, and throwing herself at the countess's feet, took both her hands and kissed them with the utmost tenderness, "Madam," said she, "the obligations I am under to your ladyship, are tenfold, on account of my not being your daughter; because if I had that honour, nature "alone

" alone would have obliged you to educate me

" as you have done; orphan as I am, I owe

" every thing to your ladyship's generosity, but 46

" you now cease to be my mother, and yet, alas!

" I find not my own to supply your place!"

"HEAVEN forbid," interrupted the earl, who had not yet spoke, "Heaven forbid you should "cease to be our child; you will be ever dear to us, and I desire you will look on this house "as your own."

JULIA thanked his lordship for this new mark of his goodness. Every thing which lord and lady Douglas had told her, was confirmed by the chaplain, who could not refrain from tears at the sight of Julia, who greatly resembled the late countess of Warwick her mother; and their features were so much alike, that when this lovely maid cast her eyes on the picture which the countess had just given her, she imagined, for some time, that it was her own, drawn without her knowledge.

LORD DOUGLAS desired her to take the cabinet which contained her jewels; but she refused' it, and requested his lordship to keep them. He told. told her, as they were her own, it was but just she should keep them herself; but added he, "My "dear child, I shall not have them long, as you are to set out to-morrow, to take a habit, which does not admit of this fort of magnificence. She blushed at these words, and retired without speaking a word.

SHE ran to her closet, and being at liberty to abandon herself to transports of joy. "How," cried she, " am I not Hypolitus's fifter ? Sure " heaven has performed this miracle to prevent " me from being for ever the most unfortunate " creature in the world. What would have been " my fituation had I known this when it was too " late; that vows and a fevere cloifter, had " deprived me of my dear Hypolitus for " ever? But, I should reproach myself " for not having been already to fee him. Shall " I be acquainted with an affair that concerns " him fo nearly, and yet delay letting him know " it?" In speaking these words she went to seek him. Her eyes were lively, and full of fire; her looks animated; and so much sprightliness in her manner, that those who had seen her but two hours before, would scarce have known her for the fame person.

MEETING

MEETING with LUCILLA, she requested she would accompany her to HYPOLITUS's chamber.

They found him pale, and so overcome with fadness, together with the weakness occasioned by his late illness, that he had scarce power to fpeak; they having enquired concerning the state of his health, he replied with a feeble voice, that he was very ill; and having remarked with aftonishment, mixed with anger, the joy which Ju-LIA could not possibly conceal. " As to you, " my fifter," faid he, " there is no occasion to " alk how you are, it is fufficient to look at you, " to know you are well, and you never appear-" ed to me so composed as you do at present." " Nor had I ever so much reason to be so" replied she, with a smile. "How!" cried he, " you " are going to leave us, and yet feem rejoiced; " be fo good I befeech you, as to conceal it, and " do not thus infult LUCILLA and I on account " of our grief. Alas! JULIA you will depart " but too foon, and your constraint will not last long, as to-morrow will be the fatal day in " which we are to lose you."

LUCILLA observing that JULIA made no reply, and was making signs to her brother, went the

er.

th

ed

to

te

at

-

)

to the window, and having opened it, left them at liberty to speak. Julia then looking on Hypolitus, who appeared much confused, at observing her to be so composed, "What joyful "news I have to tell you, Hypolitus," said she, "you will scarce believe me, and will ima"gine it to be all a siction." "I will believe "every thing you tell me," replied he with impatience. "But," my dear sister, "what news "can now be agreeable to me, are not my missor"tunes without a remedy?"

"But, suppose I should prove not to be your safety," interrupted she, "would not that be a great step towards your happiness, of which at present you despair?" He made no reply, but casting his eyes towards heaven, as much as to let her know he did not imagine any such thing.

"I ut a continuing her discourse, said, "I reproach myself with having kept, you so long in suspence, after telling you I was acquainted with something that would rejoice you; but be affured, my dear Hypolitus, that you are not my brother, nor am I your sister." She then informed him of what she had heard relating.

"fuade them for a few days that I am ill," faid fhe, "but my chearful countenance and healthy look will betray me; there is a great difference between a person that fuffers, and one who only feigns to suffer." "My dear fister," replied Hypolitus, "let that be your beginning, and we will after find out other methods."

As he spoke these words, LUCILLA approached them, and in a sprightly tone said, "In what "manner will you requite me for my complaifance, do you think I have been much amused during your discourse.—But I am too good."

"AH! LUCILLA, LUCILLA," faid JULIA, embracing her, "if you could be fecret, how re"joiced I should be in requiting your goodness,
"by entrusting you with all mine." "If I
"could be fecret," replied LUCILLA, sighing,
"methinks you do not use your elder sister as you should; a little more respect, my dear Ju"LIA, or I shall demand justice of my brother."
"Your judge is ready to condemn you," said Hypolitus, taking her hand, and causing her to sit on the bed, "I cannot be against Julia."
"Who will then take my part?" added Lucil-

ď

" and I already reproach myself for having doubtded your secrecy; but for the future I will make you my confidant."

SHE then related to her what she had told Hy-POLITUS, and having by this confidence, gained the lovely Lucilla to her interest, received from her proofs of a most fincere friendship. When she began to reflect that she was no longer Ju-LIA's fifter, she cried most bitterly, " Alas!" faid she, " fince we are not fisters, I fear you " will deprive me of your confidence, and attach " yourfelf to a person of more merit, than me. I " know not, my dear fifter," replied Julia embracing her, " where I shall find that person you " fpeak of, and I am convinced it would be in " vain, to attempt the fearch, therefore, do not " think me weak enough to change; you will ever " be dear to me my LUCILLA, and I have given " you the greatest proof in my power : but I be-" lieve it were better for us to retire, least we " should be surprized together, as you well know " what a lecture we already got on that account:

They immediately quitted the enamoured Hy-

POLITUS, who feemed like one enchanted; his fever, which was only caufed by grief, ceafed all at once, and notwithstanding his weakness he arose. Mean while Julia, (the better to execute the plan which had been concerted between them.) went to bed, and caused the windows of her apartment to be close shut; and LUCILLA assisted her in endeavouring to persuade lord and lady Douglas of her being very ill, which was a very difficult talk. The phylicians did not find her in the least feverish, but rather that she had the looks of a person in perfect health; they knew not what to prescribe. She complained much of her head giving sometimes a loud shriek. LUCILLA told them she suffered greatly that night, and never closed her eyes. No one doubted the truth of this, and the doctors having told the counters that change of air might be of fervice to her, she was immediately removed to Buckingham, MEAN while HYPOLITUS tasted a pleasure histherto unknown to him, and he now abandoned himself to the tenderest and most violent passion that could engage a heart such as his. He lost not a moment in being near his dear mistress, and as they imagined her to be in a bad state of health, every

U

every one endeavoured to amuse her, which gave Hypolitus frequent opportunities of conversing with her.

THE earl and his lady gave themselves no trouble concerning their behaviour, as they were perfuaded she had not changed her sentiments, and only waited the return of her health to set out for France.

THE earl of BEDFORD flattered himself that his constancy and perseverance would at last inspire this lovely maid with other resolutions than those he imagined she had taken, which occasioned his coming frequently to Buckingham, and he omitted nothing which he thought could engage her pity; but she treated him with such indifference that he could not in the least statter himself with being able to please her.

His assiduities did not fail to disturb the enamoured Hypolitus, who could not conceal his vexation from Julia, whom he one day met alone in the wood, and having spoke of this lover for some time, "I am convinced," added he, "that "he adores you, that he wears your chains, and "that every one is acquainted with his having "that

"that honour, which I cannot behold with any degree of tranquillity." "Ah! HYPOLITUS!"
replied JULIA smilling, "if you were to know what mortifications he has suffered for this honour, you would pity him; I treat him in fuch a manner as must soon make him disgusted with his troublesome perseverance.

In speaking these words, they continued their walk, and being near the grotto, Julia who was a little fatigued, entered with Hypolitus to rest herself. The countess had been in the wood giving orders for some improvements she intended should be made, but when she saw the lovers approach towards the grotto, having a great desire to hear their conversation, that she might satisfy some doubts which she had of Julia's illness being seigned, and that her son was the cause of the obstacles which prevented her departure, she therefore glided quickly into an obscure corner of the grotto, placing herself behind a large rock that projected out and formed a kind of niche.

JULIA sat down on one of the mosty banks, while HYPOLITUS threw himself at her feet.

"I cannot bear to see you continue in so uneasy.
" an attitude," making him rise, and sit by her.
"Ah!"

N

"Ah!" faid he, "then I fear you no longer re"member that it was here you faved my life, for "which reason I ought to fall at your feet, to
"shew my gratitude."

" ALAS! HYPOLITUS!" faid she, " what a " cruel day do you recal to my rememberance, " I shall never forget it." " I ought to remember " it better than you, my dear Julia," interrupted he, " fince that day which you call cruel was " a very fortunate one to me. It was then I first " heard from your lovely lips that you were at " last moved at my tears; if it was possible for " me to express what an effect that confession " produced in my foul, also my extreme despair " when I imagined they were going to force you " into a condition contrary to your inclinations, " and my repose, rather let heaven," continued he, rifing with fury, he was going to continue his speech when casting his eyes towards the end of the grotto, he perceived the countess his mother which caused him to cry out with furprize; and Julia having feen her at the fame time, they were fo amazed that they remained like two flatues.

THE countess having heard enough for her purpose, purpose, came out of the fatal place, and looking at them with indignation in her eyes, "I did not "imagine," said she to Julia, "that a maid of "your condition would dispose of your heart "without the knowledge of those on whom you depend. And as to you Hypolitus, that are acquainted with our intentions, you are very "rash in daring to engage the affections of Julia, while we are on the point of concluding your marriage with lady Argyle." In speaking these words she went quickly out of the grotto without waiting their answer.

It is impossible to express what those lovers felt at that instant, nor could any thing equal their affliction. "HYPOLITUS," said she, "I fore"see there is a terrible storm just ready to over"whelm us, and the more I reslect, the more I am confounded. Alas! why did they not leave me in the error I was in, and I should have been in a convent by this."

"An! my dear Julia, what is it you thus lament? our misfortunes are not so great as you imagine. When I thought myself your brother, I could not then profit by a tenderness on which depended the happiness of my life, but now I have

g

t

of

ť

u

e

Y.

have it in my power to convince you of the greatness of my love."

"An my dear Hypolitus," said she, looking on him in a languishing manner, " you may " rest satisfied with the sincerity of mine for you, " which is so violent that you would almost wish " it were less; but my heart will not take the ad-" vice which reason offers, and I fear our tender-" ness will cause us many misfortunes. Your pa-" rents being now acquainted with our love, ha-" ving already defigned you for your coufin, will " certainly saparate us, and perhaps Hypoli-" TUS, perhaps alas! your JULIA will never " fee you more." ___ " Do not disturb my " tranquillity," interrupted he, by fuch dreadful " predictions, and be affured my Julia that I " will fooner ceafe to live, than ceafe being your's, " and there is no power on earth capable of mak-" ing me alter these sentiments.

"I AM satisfied in regard to your constancy, and have not the least doubt of what you tell me," replied Julia, "but yet if they were determined to carry me to France, and force me to become a nun, what should we then resolve on?" On any thing, madam," replied Hyro, mit to fuch violence, I would do every thing in my power to prevent it. What! shall I tamely fee you made a sacrifice of, under pretence that fortune has denied you her favours, and at the same time nature has been so lavish as to be-flow charms that make you one of the loveliest creatures on earth. But believe me, a little firmness on our side, will bring us out of this dilemma, and deliver us from the intended perfecutions."

LITTA

"HYPOLITUS," faid she, "I shall neither want courage or constancy; but my duty is yet dearer to me than my love, and it shall never overcome it." "Ah! my dear Julia," said he, "is what I ask you contrary to your duty? Can there be a purer and more respectable fame than mine? do not therefore be dismayed at a time when we have need of all our fortitude, to support us against the violence which we may soon expect will be offered us."

In speaking these words, he kissed Julia's hand, who seemed perfectly acquainted with the state of his soul, by his great emotion and sights

Iŧ

It being late, these lovers parted, after having once more assured each other their love would be perpetual.

the areas have most seed appoint beautiched As foon as Julia returned to her apartments, one of her ladyship's women came to defire she would attend her immediately; the grew pale and trembled as if the had been fent for to receive fentence of death. Being come to the countels's chamber, the observed that her ladyship, and the earl (who was present) regarded her in a different manner, than they were accustomed to do. "Your conduct is so different from what we ex-" pected it would have been from your duty, " that I cannot any longer call you daughter; is " it possible Julia that after having received and " treated you as our own child, you have fo little " remains of gratitude as to ruin HYPOLITUS's " fortune, and make him fwerve from his duty " to us? You are the cause of a passion which " you know is contrary to our wishes, though at " the same time you would perfuade us that " you want to be a nun! What is become of " those fentiments full of fincerity and justice, which you were fo remarkable for possessing, " and

**

" and are you no longer the fame person you were "formerly?"

THE fair JULIA was greatly shocked at these undeferved reproaches from the countefs. She was fo fensible of what is called duty and frankness of heart, that it was an affront of the highest nature, to accuse her of neglect in either. Her modelty at first caused her to bhill, and her anger at fuch ill-natured treatment, made her blufhes continue; she kept her eyes for some time fixed on the ground, but at last looking on the countess, the replied with modelty mixed with a becoming bride, " I dare affure you, madam, that I am " not ungrateful, and that the obligations I have " to your ladyship will never be effaced from my " memory. I must however confess, that my fen-" timents for Hypolitus has ever betrayed my-" felf; I imagined I loved him only as a brother, " but I cannot deny, fince, you madam, already " know it, that this friendship has made greater or progress in my heart than I would have permitted " had I been it's miftres; but I discovered this misfortune at a time when it was no longer in my power to feek a remedy. Hypolitus himself, was incapable of using any, protesting 70

fe

æ

.

" at the same time, that his life depended entire-" ly on my conduct towards him; and my weak-" ness being seconded by particular motives which " attached me to his interest, it was no longer in " my power to deny him a return; and if any " thing could have fortified me in my indulgence " for him, it was the thoughts of not being alto-" gether unworthy the honour of your alliance. " It is true, madam, my fortune is but fmall, " but it is not always great wealth which confti-" tutes the peace and happiness of life, and I have " heard it affirmed, that the union of hearts is " absolutely necessary in an engagement which is " to last for life. I have the honour of being re-" lated to your ladyship, as well as lady ARGYLE, " for whom you intend Hypolitus. " and therefore, madam," interrupted the earl, " I suppose you imagine because my son loves " you, and you him, it was fufficient, and that " your being contented should make us so; but ". you have flattered yourfelf too much, and that " you may for the future, take the necessary mea-" fures for your repose, I now declare you must ei either consent to marry the earl of BEDFORD, or be a nun; there is no medium, chase which

" you please, and to-morrow I shall expect your "answer."

JULIA overwhelmed with such cruel treatment retired, with an heart so full of grief, that, entering her chamber where Hypolitus waited for her, she sunk down on the sloor, like one just expiring. Lucilla ran to her succour, and Hypolitus was so much affected, that he stood almost in as much need of assistance as his mistress. She remained for some time in this situation, but recovering herself a little, she made them acquainted with the conversation she had with the earl and his lady.

Ir was then they began to reflect on the misfortunes which were preparing for them. "Just "heaven, am I too happy," cried HYPOLITUS, with looks full of grief, " to find my hopes blast-"ed in a moment; but, what do I say, my dear "Julia, if you are not against me, who is it dare attempt to separate our hearts?"

" fuffer,

[&]quot;BE affured, HYPOLITUS," faid she, "that death alone can part us; I am resolved, and promise you I will never alter my sentiments; nor am I ignorant of what they will make me

71

1

" fuffer, but all my trouble will be welcome as it " will only ferve to keep me constant to my dear "HYPOLITUS," This faithful lover, overcome with gratitude, replied in the most tender manner possible on such an occasion; but they were not a little embarraffed to think what answer JULIA should give the next day, to lord and lady Dove-DAS : they refolved at bot that the fhould alk their leave to remain with them for forme time, or elfe go to France: because if they conserved to the latter, Hyporirus, might eafily go over and fee ber. In regard to the propoled marriage with the earl of Brosonne for was determined to refuse it in the strongest manner possible, so as to make them give up every hope of her compliance. Jones of which to appoint all world "

While they were thus forming their plan of operation, the earl and his lady were confidering in what manner they should rid themselves of their fears, on account of their font being so violently in love with Julia: If we send her to France, said they, he will undoubtedly follow her, as love is the parent of ingenuity; and as it is not in our power to force her to take the veil, therefore the best expedient will be to send the youth

15

little entarrefied to think what answer &

on his travels; perhaps absence may make him forget her, when he will be no longer near her; Julia may change her mind, and the earl of Bedroad's constancy may at last prevail with her to marry him.

HAVING formed this resolution, they commanded Lucitla to acquaint her fifter, they would give her a little more time to make her choice, than they at first intended, which gave her some hopes that the earl would at last be overcome by their mutual passion, and confert to make them happy. She hinted this to her lover but he did not dare flatter himfelf with fuch vain hopes, " Ah I my dear Turn," faid he, " too well I " know the fentiments of those who oppose our " union, nor will they much longer permit us to " enjoy our repole, and my foul is alarmed by a fad forebodings which diffurb its tranquillity." JULIA answered only by her tears; HYPOLITUS mixing his fighs with her's, and their grief became so visible, that the earl and his lady began to fear they would at last be obliged to confent to their. union; and as they imagined the best way would be to separate them, they secretly gave orders for HypoLitus's equipage, which being very fplendid, did, they hoped he would be pleafed to fee himfelf thus fumptuously equipped, that he might appear with luftre and make a figure at foreign courts.

to with the shall his the well to be THINGS were in this fituation, when one day lord and lady Douglas caused Hypolitus to be called into their presence, " My son," faid the earl, " if we consulted only our own satisfaction. " it is certain it would be more agreeable to us to " have you at home, than that you should be " absent, but as you are now of a proper age to "travel, it is time you should fet out to visit fo-" reign parts, to improve your understanding, fi-" nish your studies, and render your conversation " more polite. We hope you are satisfied it is " for the improvement of your mind that we agree " to your taking this tour; you shall first travel " through France, from thence to Italy and "Germany, and return through Holland; and " having paffed three years in viewing the differ-" ent curiofities in these countries, we shall ex-" pect your return, with many transports of joy. that to precipitate a departare

Hyrotre vs trembled at these words, which seemed like a thunder-bolt to him, he knew not what

11 73

what to refolve on; at first he determined to declare his passion for Julia, and affure them that nothing on earth should ever part him from her; that if they were determined to fend him on his travels, they must first put him in possession of his dear JULIA; but on fecond thoughts, he feared it would only cause this lovely maid to be tormented by new perfecutions; or elfe deprive him of her, by placing her in a convent where he should never see her more. It would be impossible to describe the different passions which agitated his foul, though they partly gueffed the cause" of his emotion, by his looks; they continued to diffemble, and not feeming to perceive the cause of his embaraffment, acquainted him, that, as every thing was ready, they wished him to fet out for France, in company with monheur de Bois DAUPHIN, the French king's ambaffador, who being their intimate friend, would be glad of his company; and as he was to leave London in two days, he had only that time to take leave of his friends. Hypolitus concealing his displeasure as much as possible, replied coldly, that he would obey them, but that so precipitate a departure feemed more like going irro enile, than a journey of pleasure of and or siderabout a sail bones He intended at first to acquaint Julia with what had passed between them, but on second consideration, he determined to consult with one of his best and most intimate friends, in what manner he should conduct himself. This obliged him to mount his horse, and set out immediately for London, to seek the earl of Sussex, from whom he had on several other occasions received such genuine proofs of a sincere friendship, that he doubted not but he would serve him on this, with his accustomed generosity.

BEING arrived at the earl of Sussex's, he was there informed that his friend was in the Park, where he met him, walking with the marquis of NORTHAMPTON, and the duke of NORTHUMBERLAND's fon; he joined company with them, and after taking some turns, he whispered his friend that he wanted to speak with him, on an affair of great consequence which required haste.

THE earl of SUSSEX made use of this pretence to leave his friends, telling them he would very soon have the pleasure of meeting them again, to finish the subject of their conference; then turning to Hypolitus, "you have obliged me

" very much," faid he, " in taking me from the " conversation I was engaged in, which was not " at all pleafing, fince it was on state affairs: The " king's distemper being so violent, that every " one are affured there is fomething extraor-"dinary in it, therefore they are making " a party against the next reign, and wanted me " to be of theirs in favour of the princes JANE; " she is young and beautiful, and my heart would " easily biass me in her favour, but though she is " niece to HENRY VIII. yet the princes MARY Inhould be regarded as the lawful heirefs to the crown, and I did not not answer them quite as " they would have wished, when you met us." He would have continued his discourse without observing that Hypotitus took no manner of notice, but feemed greatly troubled; they quitted the Park, and going towards the King's Meufe, " We are now at liberty," faid the earl, embracing Hypolitus, " therefore speak " my dear friend, and delay no longer letting me " know in what manner I can ferve you."

"You may be of great service to me," said HYPOLITUS, " in the situation to which my father's obduracy has reduced me, and it is only " from fuch a friend as you, that I can expect " any affiftance," " My dear Sussex," continued he, " I am in despair; I must set out the " day after to-morrow with monfieur de Boss " DAUPHIN, the French ambaffador whom his " mafter has recalled, and I must leave JULIA! " that Julia whom I adore, and who alone can " complete the happiness of my life; but you, " my friend, are so well acquainted with my love " for this charming maid, that I need not lofe " more time at prefent; but let the confequence " be what it will, I am resolved not to depart. " and I will, if you think proper, conceal my ferwants at your country feat, from whence I may " frequently vifit my her."

King EDWARD VI.

"EVERY thing in my power is at your dispe"fal," replied the earl of Sussex, "but permit "me to tell you, it will be very difficult to de"ceive lord Douglas for any time." "Sup"pose it were but for one day," replied HypoLITUS with eagerness, "that day shall be employed, in seeing Julia; and I desire only to know if you will affish me?" "If I will affish you," cried lord Sussex, "indeed, you offend me;
I thought

I thought you were better acquainted with me than I find you are." Hypolitus embracing him alked his forgiveness for this mark of distrust, and having thanked him in the warmest manner for this new proof of his friendship, he was leaving him in haste, on account of his great impatience to return to Julia; but lord Sussex offering to accompany him to Buckingham, they set out together. "Alas! my friend," said Hypolitus, "if only a few hours absence from my dear Julia appear so long, how is it possible I should support one of three years? and it is impossible for me to live long in this manner?" these friends separated when they approached the castle and lord Sussex returned to London.

When Hypolitus arrived, he perceived Julia at her window, who made figns she wanted him, on which he flew to her apartment. She chid him for his abrupt departure, and asked from whence he came, as she saw him with surprize take horse after the long conversation he had with with lord and lady Douglas. "Ah brother," continued she, "is it thus you love me, to leave "me in suspence? had I been in your place I "should have done quite otherwise".

THOUGH

ne

ng

ft,

er

V-

i-

-

t

y

THOUGH HYPOLITUS was not to blame, and could easily justify himself, yet he was so alarmed at the least anger from Julia that her reproaches almost stunned him, but recovering a little, " it is " I, my lovely Julia," said he, in a respectful manner, " that have reason to complain of your suspicions; is it possible, my Julia, you could "form any to my prejudice for such a triste? and you no longer believe my fincerity, since you are " so ready to accuse me."

Julia loved him with too much tenderness to let him remain any longer in the uneasiness she had caused. "It is true," said she, "I confess I was a little unjust in my doubts, and you are already too unfortunate, without seeking other causes for new torments." "Let us then be friends, my dear mistress," said he, kissing her hand, I agree, with you, that our troubles are of themselves sufficient to overwhelm us, without adding to them: know Julia, that my father is resolved to send me abroad, to be out of your sight; but I have just now settled my affairs in such a manner as to remain incognito in London, and we must invent some method of seeing each other."

" d

22

HE then acquainted her with what had been refolved on by lord Sussex and himfelf, and having confulted together for some time, on the means of feeing each other without being discovered; they fent for LUCILLA, from whom they now concealed nothing. "Come, my dear fifter," faid Tulia to her, " come and lend us your affiftance, " your thoughts are more composed than ours, " and can fooner find out expedients than we." Having told her of their scheme, she was silent for fome time, and then faid they might eafily fee each other by means of the back stairs, which led from their apartment to the garden, and from thence to a dark walk, at the end of which towards the wood was a little door that opened into the road, of which HYPOLITUS must get the key, that it would be easy for them to descend this flaircase without being discove ed, and Hy-POLITUS, by means of his key, might enter when he pleased,

"It is true," faid JULIA, "but how shall we do to keep up a proper decorum; I am not your sister, therefore it will not seem well in the eyes of the world, to open my door, and admit you thus at night by stealth? will it not be

" be called an affignation? methinks such con" duct would not be very discreet,"

" Is it possible," said Lucilla, " that you " can consider it with such coolness? it is true " HYPOLITUS is not your brother, but will he " not be your husband? and as to me, I promise " never to leave you together; and though I have " every thing to apprehend from m father and " mother's anger, I will with pleasure run that " risque, to give you a proof of the greatness of " my friendship." --- " And I, my charming Ju-" LIA," faid HYPOLITUS, " I who will remain " in London only to have the pleafure of feeing " you sometimes in this place, how shall I sup-" port the thought of leaving you, if you do not " consent, and I might as well leave England if " that is your intention; will you then forfake " me Julia? will you banish me for ever from. " your presence ?"

"AH!" cried she, "too well you know your" power over me to doubt my compliance; but let us reslect to what dangers we may expose ourselves, the very idea of which alarms me most terribly!" They used every method to remove her fears; and that same night Hypolirus took the impression of the key of the little door in wax, and sent it immediately to his friend the earl of Sussex, to get a key made to leave with Julia at his departure from Buckingham.
G 2

EVERY thing was executed according to their plan, and on the day fixed for HYPOLITUS'S departure, lord Douglas accompanied him to London; at first he intended to see him on board the yatch, but he contented himself with seeing him get into the post chaise, which drove away as soon as they had embraced each other; his lordship being pleased at his son's ready obedience.

HYPOLITUS went on board the yatch where monsieur de Bois Dauphin expected him, and as he was greatly beloved by this gentleman, he in private acquainted him that he had some very particular reasons which would oblige him to remain in England; that he had great considence in his goodness, and conjured him to regard him with an eye of pity, and that he hoped the trust he reposed in him would answer his most fanguine expectations. Hypolitus sinding by his looks that that he seemed favourably inclined towards him, said it would be highly necessary to persuade his father of his being in a bad state of health at Dieppe; because if monsieur de Bois Dauphin was to write the earl word of his being arrived in Paris, he would be surprized at not receiving news of him from the ambassador and other English lords who were then at the court of France, but if he would have the goodness to write to the earl and leave him the letter, he would take care and send it to him at a proper time; and he again assured him that the preservation of his life depended entirely on his compliance with this request.

"I EASILY comprehend you," faid monfieur de Bois Dauphin, smiling, "you are in love "young gentleman, and to serve you I must ex"pose myself to the anger of the earl your father; but I once was young as you are at present, and "a secret inclination attaches me more to your interest than his, therefore let us immediately "write as you desire."

HYPOLITUS was overjoyed, and thanked him a thousand times, as his goodness deserved, and received from him the letter, in which he wrote to his lordship that HYPOLITUS remained in a bad state of health at Dieppe.

HERE they took leave of each other, and HYPOLITUS getting into a shallop which waited for him, he came up to London, and landed a little above the Tower, where the earl of Sussex expected his arrival, waiting for him near the waterfide in his coach, and had given orders to his gentleman to provide horses for the domestics of HyPOLITUS, and conduct them to his country-seat;
all these necessary precautions being taken, lord Sussex conducted him to his house in town, least he should be seen.

WHEN they were retired, the lover who thought of nothing but his Julia, was greatly troubled at not being any longer in the same house with her.

"I spoke to her every moment," said he to lord Sussex, who passed the night with him, "had permission to visit her when I pleased, and notwithstanding the countess's order to the contrary, we found means of seeing each other every hour; but now we are nine miles asunder, which is nothing to those who are not greatly in love, though I think it a great length;
add

add to this the precautions we must use at our interviews, least we should be discovered; in fine such obstacle as one can neither foresee or

" prevent, and which may entirely disconcert our es meafures."

and the trans

" You are greatly in love," interrupted lord " Sussex, fmiling, " all those fears and doubts. " with which you perplex yourself, are great " proofs of that paffion; but prithee don't you " find yourfelf happier here, than on board a " yatch at fea, which would convey you to a " much greater distance from your mistress than " you are at present? but let me ask why the " obedience of the earl's fervants to all your or-" ders feem so very triffing? your gentleman also " who by his age, and the confidence your father " placed in him, by making him your governor, " he I say, who had reason to be surprized at your return, and should have defired to know " the occasion, was the first to set the example of " obedience to the fervants. I affure you I was " not a little furprized at this part of your good " fortune, and fince Julia will permit you to fee " her, I think you are not much to be pitied."

"I AM indeed in the wrong," replied HYPO-LITUS, with impatience, "not to be fatisfied; "but my dear Sussex, if you were to know, "what it is to be violently in love, you would "then be of my opinion; but, you are a rover, "and are content with faying fine things to every "fair one you meet with, but yet love none with "fincerity."

"My dear Hypolitus," interrupted the earl, " you imagine the only happiness in life is to love. " beyond measure, and I think just the reverse; . " we should always pay great court to the ladies, s and be affiduous in gaining their good opinion, " but we should never attach ourselves in such a " manner as to disturb our repose, or neglect the " making our fortunes. CESAR was in love in st time of peace, but indifferent in time of war: " he changed his miftress as often as he did king-" doms, and provinces. Thus you fee we should " look on the love of great men as an amuse-" ment; though I must confess, a little of that " passion is necessary, because we cannot be accomplished but by frequenting the company of " the fair fex; and it is by the politeness of their " conversation.

1

" conversation, that a man learns to refine " what is rude and unpolished in his manner: " but I will maintain that nothing is more dan-" gerous than this violent infatuation called love, " it renders us incapable of every thing but ador-" ing a mistress. When a person is in that situa-" tion they are troublesome to themselves and " to every one elfe; they weep and figh, are al-" ways uneasy, often jealous and angry; and for " one happy moment, they pass a thousand mi-" ferable ones, which are fo dreadful, that they " are in a continual inquietude, and finally-" Ah! my dear friend," cried Hypolitus, interrupting him, " a truce to your criticisms; they " are so severe, and your taste so deprayed, that " two more fuch conversations as this, would " make me your irreconcileable enemy; and I " cannot express what violent emotions of anger " I felt during your ill-natured fpeech against true " lovers."

THE earl of Sussex burst into a fit of laughter, and promised his friend to offend no more in that manner, but to make up for his constraint, he resolved for the future, to be entirely free, and love love as many as he pleased without being found fault with by his friend.

DAY appeared just as they ended their conversation, which occasioned them not to rise 'till it was late; and having dined, HYPOLITUS requested his friend to go to Buckingham, and know from JULIA or LUCILLA, when he should attend them.

As lord Sussex was well known to the earl and his lady, and had always been well received, they were now extremely rejoiced to fee him: "You are come, my lord," faid the countess, " in a happy time, to confole me for the depar-" ture of my fon, as I am forry for his absence." "That is your own fault, madam," replied lord Sussex, " fince you consented to it, and your " ladyship had it in your choice to detain him if " you had thought fit." " I understand you," faid she, " you reproach me with being the cause " of his absence, but indeed, though it was " a great trouble to us, we could not dispense " with the necessity there was for his beginning " his travels; but tenderness should ever give way to the advantage of the person beloved, and:

" and we shall with joy behold his return after " a three years absence.

LUCILLA and JULIA were present at the conversation, but the arrival of the earl of Bedford, caused lord Sussex to address himself only to LUCILLA, as the earl of Bedford had placed himself next Julia; every thing which related to the assignation was fixed for that same night, and soon after the earl of Sussex took his leave, and returned to Hypolitus.

They thought it expedient to disguise themselves, for fear of being met on the road by any one that might know and discover them. They wore wiggs of a different colour from their hair, over which they put large hunting-caps, which being unfolded entirely covered their face, and having changed their dress, they set out from London about ten o'clock. The night was calm and serene, all was quiet in the country, through which they passed. They took but one footman with them to take care of their horses, and being arrived at the little door, which they found open for their reception; they entered the dark walk, and met the two sisters who were advancing towards

wards them, having heard the noise of their horses

HYPOLITUS and JULIA at fight of each other felt transports of joy impossible to describe; the conversation for some time was general, but the lover foon took his mistress's hand and leading her away by degree (though without quitting the walk they were in) gave lord Sussex an opportunity of entertaining LUCILLA. " Heaven be " praised my dear Hypolitus," said Julia, " your absence has not being very long ! and you " are returned notwithstanding the measures which " have been taken to separate us." " If I loved " you less my dear JULIA" said he, " perhaps I " should have had some trouble in surmounting so " many difficulties, but my passion is too violent and " too ingenuous to yield to opposition." " You " were scarce gone," continued she, " when the " countels spoke to me in private, and after giv-" ing me proofs of her friendship, which in the " circumstances we are in, furprised me; told me " that as she had good reasons to believe that I " never intended being a nun, she would advise " me, as one of my best friends, to think on the " earl of BEDFORD's proposals; that he was a " nobleman

ries

her

the

ut

ng

he

1-

e

1,

u

" nobleman of strict principles, of wealth and fi-" gure, and that once for all, I must never think " of being united to you; that she could not " forbear telling me I was the cause of your de-" parture, and that her lord and she would ne-" ver consent to your return while I remained " fingle." " And what answer did you make, " my dear Julia?" said Hypoditus, a little disturbed. " I told her, that in regard to the " earl of BEDFORD, I requested she would never " more mention him to me, that nothing would ever make me conquer my aversion for him; " that fince she intended you should be absent " during three years, I hoped the would at least " give me time to refolve on fomething, as my " future peace would entirely depend on the " choice I should make, and that I could not 46 have too much time for reflection.

"SHE could not but be of my opinion, and as the earl of Bedford came to-day, while the earl of Sussex was here, he began to entertain me with his passion, but I could not help letting him know how disagreeable his perseverance was to me; that though I at first regarded him with indifference, yet I now had an II unconquerable

"unconquerable aversion for him, and that if he chose to make me wretched, he need only continue his visits! What madam, cried he, do you forbid me to see you? I do, replied I, most earnestly entreat you to cease persecuting me. Ah! madam, continued he, you will drive me to distraction, by depriving me of the only pleasure I have left. I love you, even to adoration, and what shall I do if you banish me for ever from your presence? You will, my lord, replied I, soon cure yourself of a passion which to me is very troublesome, and makes you needlessly suffer: in ending those words, I saw in his eyes and countenance all the signs of real despair.

"An! my lovely Julia," replied Hypolitus, "how happy does this make me, and what am I not indebted to you for this facrifice?"
"It is no facrifice," answered Julia, "and it gives me as much pleasure as it does you, in being rid of his importunity."

HAVING remained for some time longer together, and made a thousand vows of eternal fidelity; they agreed to see each other as often as possible, for

go

pai

he

wi

in 21

h

for which purpose lord Sussex's footman was togo every day to Buckingham, but should only pass by for fear of being taken notice of, and if he saw a pot with slowers in Julia's chamber window, that should be the signal for Hypolitus to visit her at night. All these measures being taken, they parted, but with so much reluctance, that if the earl of Sussex and Lucilla had not interposed, day would have surprized them in their walk.

MEAN while HYPOLITUS sent the letter to his father, which was wrote by monssieur de Bois Dauphin, the contents of which caused much uneasiness in the family. Himself wrote from time to time as if he was yet at Dieppe; letting his father know he was sometimes better and sometimes worse; nor had any one the least suspicion of his seeing Julia almost every night, which pleasure lasted more than two months without any interruption: but their happiness was too great to last, and fortune who envyed the tranquillity of those lovers, once more began to torment them.

THE earl of BEDFORD struck with the most lively grief after the conversation he had with Ju-LIA, quitted her with the intention of never seeing her more, and if possible forget her for ever; to effect which he did every thing he imagined would forward his cure, and more than ever frequented the company of the fair sex, wishing to find a person as lovely as she, to whom he might attach himself; but his love for Julia was as violent as ever, and so greatly did she surpass all those he had seen, and conversed with, that when he compared them to her, he utterly despited them; and sound his love return in spight of all he could do to prevent it.

His passion at last encreased to such a pitch, that he resolved to use every possible means to gratify it, for which reason he determined to carry her off by force. "I am certain," said he to one of his friends, " that lord Douglas would

- " be greatly pleased with my alliance, having before offered me his eldest daughter. It is true-
- "he would not force Julia to marry me against
- "her inclinations, but when she is in my power,
- " he will perhaps be reconciled, and will prevail
- " on her to make me happy."

HAVING formed this design, his only thoughts were how to put it in execution, so as to insure its fuccess. He soon recollected that the gardener who now ferved lord Douglas, had formerly belonged to him, therefore, he imagined, that this man whom he knew to be naturally very bold and felfish, would not make any difficulty of affifting him in his enterprise. He immediately sent for him, gave him a purse of guineas, with the promife of another, and having made him acquainted with his scheme, asked his advice in what manner he should conduct himself: " It will be very easy, " my lord," faid he, " to execute your defign, I " have the key of a door which is at the end of " the garden, and by means of a dark walk that " is near it, I can convey you to a back-stairs " which leads to Julia's apartment, and I am " well affured, her door is scarcely ever locked, as " I have attended her frequently at night, when " fhe has ordered me to bring her fruit or flowers; " thus you may carry her off without being difcovered.

Thus plan being greatly approved of by the earl of BEDFORD, and the time for its execution fixed, he failed not to be at the place appointed, with two friends, in whom he could confide. It was eleven o'clock when he arrived at the door, one of his friends remained with the horses at a little distance for sear of being seen, while he with the other, entered without making any noise.

Ir happened unfortunately to be one of those nights in which JULIA had appointed HYPOLITUS and his friend to visit them, and they were just going to open the door, when by the light of the moon they perceived two men, but as the walk was very dark, they did not know at first if it was those whom they expected or not; because when they faw the women they endeavoured to conceal themselves, by retiring to some distance; but Iu-LIA advancing towards them, " You feem in no " great hafte, my dear Hypolitus," faid she; to the earl of BEDFORD, " and methinks are de-" firous to avoid me, what means this coldness?" The earl knew immediately the voice of his cruel miftress, and was greatly enraged to find fuch tender language should not be addressed to himself :: though, he was greatly overjoyed at meeting her in the garden, and would not speak for fear of undeceiving her, but made figns to his friend that he might seize Lucilla, and prevent her-crying out, while he at the same time took hold of Julia's arm, and being tall and very strong, he carried carried her towards the door in spight of the resistance she made, just as Hypolitus, and the earl of Sussex came up to it; but what were the emotions of his soul when he saw his dear Julia treated with such violence, being rendered surious by love and anger, he drew his sword, and the earl of Bedford having quitted Julia,

h

did the same, his friend being attacked by the earl of Sussex. They were all very brave, and sought with great sury; but as to Julia and Lucilla, they knew not what to do; if they called assistance their dear Hypolitus would be discovered, and if they did not, he was in danger of being killed.

MEAN while the gardener who was on the watch, fearing that the clashing of swords might be heard at the castle, went and acquainted lord Douglas, who coming at the first alarm, entered the garden just as the earl of Bedford was run through the body by Hypolitus; who seeing the number of persons that were assembled in the garden, told his friend it was time to think of their retreat; but finding the little door shut, and all the avenues guarded, they took refuge in the gardener's house, which they barricaded. Lord Douglas

DougLAS placed a guard round the house to prevent their escape, as he did not know either his son or lord Sussex, so well were they disguised.

LORD DOUGLAS caused the earl of BEDFORD to be conveyed to the castle, but fearing if he died, as he feemed to be in great danger, that he should be accused with having killed him, though they were near relations, he fent an express to London for a justice of peace, and proper officers to take charge of the prisoners, and they arrived just when Hypolitus and his friend having confulted together, refolved to force open the doors of the house, which had been secured on the outfide; they used every method in their power to accomplish this design, and at last succeeded, though the servants of lord Douglas did what they could to prevent them, and they would certainly have escaped if the officers of justice and fervants had not at last unfortunately surrounded them; his lordship at the same time commanding them to be put to the fword rather than let escape, being resolved to take them alive or dead. On hearing those cruel orders, they immediately suffered themselves to be taken prisoners, as they found it impossible to make their escape.

JULEA

JULIA and LUCILLA were fitting at the foot of a tree, half dead with fear at the fight of this dreadful scene, and it is impossible to describe their uneasiness. The two illustrious prisoners being conducted to the castle, they followed, refolving not to lose fight of them if possible. The countess waited their arrival, with an unusual emotion; they were carried into the hall, and their hunting-caps taken off, but scarce had she cast her eyes on Hypolitus, when she cried out, " Just "heaven! it is my son!——" and falling into the arms of her woman, she fainted away.

LORD DOUGLAS who did not perceive what passed, and advancing towards his lady to know the cause of her fainting, was not a little surprized at seeing his son a prisoner in his own house, when he imagined him to be at Dieppe; his amazement for a time deprived him of speech, but soon recovering, and looking at him with eyes full of sury, "Is it possible it can be you, Hy"POLITUS?" said he, "what can be your design? when I believed you were in France, I "find you in my house, armed and in disguise,
"and are besides so unfortunate as to have killed

" a man who always professed himself a friend to our house; who is nearly related to your mether, is rich, and very powerful. You are in my opinion so unworthy of my protection, that I could almost abandon you to the utmost severity of the law."

Julia who had till now concealed herfelf, being no longer able to suppress her emotion, " Ah!.. " my father," cried she, throwing herself at the earl's feet, and wetting them with her tears, " if any one deserves punishment, it is I alone, fince " it was to rescue me from the earl of BEDFORD. " that HYPOLITUS was obliged to fight; with-" out his timely affiftance I should inevitably " have been carried off, as he held me already in-" his arms, and was forcing me towards the gar-" den door, when fortunately for me, HYPOLI-" Tus came to my aid, and in my struggles to " get free, I fuffered as much violence as it was... " possible to receive from a man, who had " formed fuch a brutal design; therefore, let " fall your anger on me, and oh! my father, " fhed all my blood, but spare, oh! spare that of. " my dear Hypolitus." " Rise Julia," said. the earl, endeavouring to conceal his wrath, " I " know

* know more of this than I could wish,
"therefore, retire with your fister, to your apartments, and do not stir from thence but by my express orders.

THE unfortunate JULIA, now a prisoner, as well as HYPOLITUS, was going to retire, casting a look full of grief and tenderness on her lover, when he springing towards her and taking her hand, "what crime my lord," said he to his father," has "JULIA committed, or is she to be punished for my faults, as it is impossible she can deserve "this unworthy treatment?" "Hold, rash boy!" replied the earl parting them, "and do not far"ther provoke my vengeance."

THE earl of Sussex was greatly moved at this scene and lady Douglas now recovered from her lit, addressing herself to him, "Ah! my lord," said she, "what a dangerous friend you have been to "my son, by having so much compassion for his "weakness, as if our situation did not deserve more pity than his." "Hypolitus is certain-"ly more to be pitied," replied lord Sussex with earnestness, "and your ladyship, excuse me, madam, is in part the cause of the present missortune; why madam, did you send him from England

"England when you were no stranger to the violence of his passion for Julia?" "To cure him of it," interrupted the countess, "we stattered ourselves, that absence would produce the fame effect in him, which it frequently does in others, and let me tell you, my lord, if you had not been so ready to assist my son, and that he had gone to France as we thought, I am convinced that his passion for Julia would by this time have been entirely forgot."

WHILE they were thus disputing, the surgeons who had been sent for to dress the earl of BEDFORD'S wounds, came to acquaint the earl of Douglas with his situation, and informed him, that he was wounded in three places, and that one of them appeared to be mortal; on hearing this report, the justice demanded that Hypolitus should immediately surrender himself, and be conducted to Newgate. Lord Douglas enraged at this proposal, told the justice he would never consent to his son's being imprisoned, but would himself become bound for his appearance; which being accepted of, the justice and his officers took their leave and retired.

LORD and lady Douglas would have been well

well pleased if the earl of Sussex had done the same, so much were they disturbed at his presence; but this generous friend, not seeming to observe their displeasure, which at another time, he would have resented as became him, told them that he would be a partaker in Hypolitus's fortune, and if he must die, they would die together. He was confined in the same apartment with Hypolitus, and guarded very closely, the fair Julia and Lucilla, being shut up in theirs with equal care.

THESE precautions being taken, the earl and his lady set out for London, and the moment after their arrival there, waited on lady Bedford. She was no stranger to her son's passion for Julia, having consented to his paying his addresses to her, but being entirely ignorant of what had happened at Buckingham, she was greatly grieved at hearing the dangerous condition her son was in. It is in your ladyship's power said the earl, to cause us much trouble, and yet in the end, you may be more embarrassed than we; as all the blame must certainly lie on your son, when the truth is known, which in case of a prosecution must certainly appear, that he would have " carried off Julia by force, and that her bro" ther in rescuing her, had wounded him.

"I have an offer to make your ladyship, which

" if agreeable, will prevent all difputes, I will

" fend Hypolitus abroad for three years, and

" in case your son should recover from his wounds.

" and be desirous of marrying Julia, I here en-

" gage my honour, that I will omit nothing in my

" power to make her confent to marry him."

LADY BEDFORD would not give an answer till she had the advice of her friends and relations. who being informed of this melancholy news, came to pay their compliments of condolence to her ladyship. She immediately acquainted them with the earl of Douglas's proposals, they were of opinion that the terms were fuch as she could not refuse, and were much suprized at the earl's condescending offer, to send his son out of England, it is true they were entirely ignorant of his motives for fo doing.

This affair being thus amicably adjusted, the earl took his barge and went to Gravefend, where he was informed a veffel lay that was to fail in a few days for Leghorn; he therefore determined And they proceed their that that

CONTRA

fu:e

that Hypolitus should go by this opportunity, not doubting but the beauties of Italy, would soon make him forget the fair Julia; and having agreed with the captain, who only waited for a fair wind, he thought it would be better to bring his son to London, that he might not lose this opportunity.

Bur to return to Hypolitus, all his fears were for the fafety of his miftress, and as he never doubted but that his father would take an effectual method to separate them for ever, so great was his despair at those dismal reflections that had not his religion, and the greatness of his foul been fuperior to every other confideration, he would certainly have put a final period to his misfor-It was not possible for him to bribe his guards to favour his escape, though they did not refuse to inform him of every thing that passed in the family, having defervedly a great love for him, befides they regarded him as their future lord. Being told of his father's going to Gravefend, it gave him great anxiety, as it ferved to confirm his suspicions; he therefore asked a footman (who had been placed both as an attendant and fpy) if he would do him the plea"carried off Julia by force, and that her bro"ther in rescuing her, had wounded him. But
"I have an offer to make your ladyship, which
"if agreeable, will prevent all disputes, I will
"fend Hypolitus abroad for three years, and
"in case your son should recover from his wounds,

"and be desirous of marrying Julia, I here en-

" gage my honour, that I will omit nothing in my

" power to make her consent to marry him."

LADY BEDFORD would not give an answer till she had the advice of her friends and relations, who being informed of this melancholy news, came to pay their compliments of condolence to her ladyship. She immediately acquainted them with the earl of Douglas's proposals, they were of opinion that the terms were such as she could not refuse, and were much suprized at the earl's condescending offer, to send his son out of England, it is true they were entirely ignorant of his motives for so doing.

This affair being thus amicably adjusted, the earl took his barge and went to Gravesend, where he was informed a vessel lay that was to fail in a few days for Leghorn; he therefore determined that that Hypolitus should go by this opportunity, not doubting but the beauties of Italy, would soon make him forget the fair Julia; and having agreed with the captain, who only waited for a fair wind, he thought it would be better to bring his son to London, that he might not lose this opportunity.

Bur to return to Hypolitus, all his fears were for the fafety of his mistress, and as he never doubted but that his father would take an effectual method to separate them for ever, so great was his despair at those dismat reflections that had not his religion, and the greatness of his foul been fuperior to every other confideration, he would certainly have put a final period to his misfortunes. It was not possible for him to bribe his guards to favour his escape, though they did not refuse to inform him of every thing that passed in the family, having defervedly a great love for him, befides they regarded him as their future lord. Being told of his father's going to Gravefend, it gave him great anxiety, as it ferved to confirm his suspicions; he therefore asked a footman (who had been placed both as an attendant and fpy) if he would do him the pleafu:e

fure to deliver a letter to Julia, and bring him an answer; the fellow hesitated a little before he would promise, but not thinking that the secrets of a brother and sister could be of much consequence to a father, he accepted the commission, and as Hypolitus risqued nothing by a discovery, his parents being no longer strangers to his passion, he wrote as follows:

" TS it possible, lovely Julia, that in this house wherein I felt the first effects of " the power of your eyes, and where I so often. " had the pleasure of your dear fociety, we should " now find fo fad a reverse? It is I that am the " cause of your sufferings, and did not my love " prevent my despair, I should have died with " grief. Alas! what hopes can love now flatter " me with, am I not just going to lose you for ever, in fpight of all I have done to prevent it. " Just heaven! to what horrors am I not destin-" ed! Must I be thus torn from you, without be-" ing fuffered to take one parting embrace? This " thought diffracts me in fuch a manner that you " only my JULIA, are capable of forming an idea " of the pangs I now feel, and yet amidft my " griefs, I find some consolation in that flattering hope of your proving faithful. You would not my. Julia, betray a man who loves you beyond every thing, and will never love but you. I need not at present repeat my vows of eternal constancy! too well you know my heart and the power you have over it, to imagine it capable of inconstancy. No, Julia no, I will never change, and can never cease adoring you amidst all the persecutions that rage and malice can invent. Write to me then, my dear mistress, and do not forsake me, in the wretched fate I am in; on you depends my life and happiness, and you are the only object of my dear fires and wishes...

1

1:

This letter which the fair Julia received from her dear Hypolitus, cost her abundance of tears, and for a while prevented her reading it, her emotion being so great that Lucilla was obliged to be her comforter, though she had almost as much need of consolation as Julia herself; her parents being greatly enraged against her, as they imagined it was by her contrivance that Julia had those interviews with Hypolitus. She entreated her to lose no time in answering her brother's letter. Julia endeavoured to stop the current of her tears, but all her efforts were ineffectual, and the answer which she wrote, gave evident marks of her grief, being almost blotted with her tears. It contained these words:

TOW! my dear HYPOLITUS, are 1 1 they going to part us? Shall I a never fee you more?-How shall I describe the fituation in which your letter has thrown " me. Is it possible that the most innocent ten-" derness we had for each other, before we were " fensible of it ourselves, could have thus pro-" voked the wrath of heaven to punish us in this " manner! What a torrent of misfortunes, and " how impossible to oppose them ! Repose and " chearfulness are not only fled from me, but'my " very reason also seems to have abandoned me; " at the thoughts of your departure; but in " fpight of the grief it will be to me, I am re-" folved to fee you at going. Let us, at leaft, my dear Hypolitus, endeavour to conquer " our ill fortune by fortitude. You promise me " you will be conftant; be affured no power on " earth is capable of shaking my fidelity, not e-" ven death itself! Thus will our perseverance " triumph over our ill fortune. We shall again " behold

" behold each other, and love will at last reward our constancy.

THOSE strong assurances of an inviolable love. which the amiable JULIA fent to her dear Hyporus, could never come more opportunely; and he had great need of them to support him against the misfortunes which lord Douglas was preparing for him. Soon after Hypolerus received the answer to his letter, his father caused him and the earl of Sussex, together with LUCILLA and JULIA to be called into his presence; the countels was with him, and after a few minutes silence, addressing himself to his fon, " It is not to " reproach you, Hypolitus," faid he, " that " I have now defired to fee you, though you can-" not but be sensible, that you deserve them. You " have been greatly wanting in the respect which " is our due ; you have deceived us by sictitious " letters, without the least regard to our com-" mands, and Julia is an accomplice in your " disobedience; but you may be affured, and I " here call heaven to witness it, that we never " will confent to your being united together; " though perhaps you might, by a different con-" duct have obtained our consent, the thoughts " of it is become fo odious to us, that rather than " consent, we will do every thing in our power " to oppose it; and though she is not our daugh-" ter, yet she is so much in our power as to be en-" tirely dependent on us, in regard to her destiny; " therefore be advised, and return to your duty, prepare yourfelf Hypolitus to fet out imme-" diately for Florence, where Lhave friends who " will omit no opportunity of testifying their af-" fection for you, on my account. You will be " well received by the illustrious family of ME-" DICIS, and that you may not be ignorant of " their motives for fo doing, I must now acquaint " you that more than forty years ago, when I " was very young, and on my travels, as you will " foon be, chance procured me an opportunity " of doing a confiderable piece of service to car-" dinal Medicis, who has fince been raised to " the papal dignity, by the name of LEO X.

"He was pope's legate to the confederate are
"my, and was made prisoner by Gaston De
"Foix, at the battle of Ravenna. Marshal
"Tranvulca was going to send him to France;
"never was a person so much afflicted as he was
"on being made prisoner, and though his thoughts
"were."

1

3

9

f

t

Í

1:

were continually employed on the means of ef-" caping, yet it was so difficult to put them in " execution, that having attempted it feveral times " in vain, he loft all hopes of ever fucceeding; " but his chamberlain having found an opportu-" tunity of going to the brave ZAETI, with " whom I was at that time; the chamberlain. " who was his friend, conjured him to fave a car-" dinal celebrated both by his merit and misfor-" tunes. ZAETI asked me to be one of the par-I confented, and we arrived at the banks " of the river Po, just as the cardinal was getting into the boat to be conveyed to the other side. "We had not much difficulty in dispersing his " escort, and making him quickly disguise him-" felf in the habit of a cavalier, we brought him " to the caffle of Malespini. I there took leave " of him, being obliged to return with ZAETI, " who was my relation. The cardinal took every. " opportunity of affuring us of his gratitude and " friendship; and though he-obtained the papal " dignity the year following, I can truly fay, he " ever acknowledged the service I did him. You will also be presented to the fenator ALBERTS " one of the most illustrious families of Florence, and my intimate friend; and though I am " much

" much older than he; our friendship is as strict " as ever. He has been twice in England and " Scotland; he is one of the council of eight, " and is a man of fuch diffinguished reputation, " that as foon as I hear you are fafe arrived with " him, I shall not have a moments uneafiness." "You shall have every thing agreeable, as well as " necessary for your journey; you may judge by " our promise to lady BEDFORD, that there is " an absolute necessity for your departure, on ac-" count of your rencounter with her fon, whose " life is yet in fuch great danger, that if you " do not go, or if you return before the three " years are elapsed, I myself would be the first to " cause you to be apprehended, and perhaps " you would then be more fensible of the incon-" venience of a close imprisonment than you seem " at present to rehish our remonstrances. Your " liberty is in your own power, though you can-" not enjoy it but by leaving England. If your " friend lord Sussex, who ferved you fo faithfu!-"ly in your last scheme, will speak as a true " friend, he will no doubt advise you to obey us, " and that you may have an opportunity of tak-" ing leave of your dear JULIA, we now leave " you to enjoy a few moments together."

As he spoke thus, he retired without waiting for an answer, and the countess having followed him, the lovers aproached each other, and while lord Sussex entertained Lucilla, Hypolitus took JULIA's hand and kneeling with one knee looked on her, but could only express his grief by his fighs and tears, a most intelligible and moving language; but Julia at last breaking this mournful filence, "Do not thus be overcome" faid she, " my dear, " and too unfortunate Hypolitus, if our mif-" fortunes are great, our love and tenderness is " yet greater, and a moment will decide our fate: " there is a necessity for your departure, and it is "impossible to prevent it, therefore we must yield " with a good grace; but those who are the cause " of our separation will find it impossible to " change our love; they have ordained us a three " years absence, perhaps before they are accom-" pilshed, heaven will at last take compassion on " our misfortunes." Ah Julia, Julia," cried he, " what an effort is this! you endeavour to " fupport my dejected spirits by false hopes, when " it is but too true that in lofing you, I shall lofe " my only treasure. Oh my Julia, I fear I shall " never see you more. What will be your fate " when days program

" when I am gone? or how will you live in this " hateful place, where you are treated with fuch " indignity, the thought of what you may be oblig-" ed to fuffer in my absence will cause me an eter-" nal inquietude." " How ingenious you are in " tormenting yourfelf Hypolitus," faid Julia to him, "but be affured, wherever I am, you " alone shall be the object of my thoughts, and " wishes, and I shall regard all others with such " indifference, as to be utterly insensible to good or " bad usage." " And will you write often to " me, my dear Julia?" faid he, " if you are " permitted to receive all those I write, you will " not be at a loss for consolation. But in what " manner shall we carry on our correspondence?" These words Lucilla and lord Sussex (who were at no great distance from the lovers) overheard; they approached and defired them to be under no uneafiness in regard to that, as they would take the care of it on themselves : and they proposed that his letters should be directed to lord Sussex, who would give them to Lucit-LA. The cruel moment of separation being arrived, Julia took from her bosom a bracelet, set round with diamonds, which contained a lock of her lovely hair wove in a truelovers knot, and beneath u

d

h

70

e

re

ill

at 3"

ho

er-

be rey

and

ted

IL-

21-fet

of

be-

eath

neath it were two hearts pierced with the fame arrow, round which was wrote these words:

FOR EVER UNITED.

" KEEP this present my HYPOLITUS," faid she, " for you only are acquainted with its worth," He appeared transported at receiving this valued token of his mistress's love, which he dared not ask, and tenderly kiffing her hand they embraced and bid each other farewel. This scene was so moving that LUCILLA and lord Sussex took part in their forrows by a shower of tears. In this sad moment lord and lady Douglas returned and commanded Hypolitus to follow them : he appeared as much furprifed at this order as if he had not expected it, and cast his eyes on Julia, who kept her's fixed on the ground to conceal her tears. Lu-CILLA and lord Sussex advanced towards Hypo-LITUS, and peceiving his grief and irrefolution. they took him under each arm, and led him to the coach, and having tenderly embraced his dear fifter. he told her the greatest proof he defied of her friendship, was to devote herself entirely to his deat JULIA.

HE at last departed and JULIA being at liberty to complain, she lamented their cruel fate, sighing, and sobbing in such a manner that LUCILLA in vain endeavoured to alleviate her grief. As soon as her dear HYPOLITUS was gone, she threw herself on the sloor, and hiding her face in LUCILLA's lap uttered such moving complaints as would in some measure have lessened HYPOLITUS's grief if he had heard them.

WHILE she thus lamented his absence, he also abandoned himself to his forrows; keeing a profond filence during their journey, and did not break it till they arrived at Gravefend where he took leave of his generous friend the earl of Sussex. All his grief was renewed at this cruel separation, " I now lose my all, my dear friend," faid he ten-" derly embracing him, " and though I thought " after what I fuffered at leaving Buckingham that " nothing could effect me, and that this first stroke " would have rendered me infensible to all others, er yet I have reason to imagine, by what I now " feel, that violent love is not in the least incon-" fiftent with fuch a tender friendship as ours: " preserve me yours, my dear Sussex, in justice " to my fentiments-" He could utter no more, and lord Sussex was feized with fuch a violent violent emotion of grief, that the only proof hecould give of his friendship was, by embracing, HYPOLITUS with eyes streaming with tears, after having in vain, endeavoured to speak. Lord and lady Douglas could not behold this tender fcene unmoved, and they were greatly obliged to him in their hearts, notwithstanding their anger at what he had done for Hypolitus, who was once more defired by them to profit by their good advice; but he was fo incenfed at their feverity, that he would not be at the trouble of concealing. his fentiments, which broke forth in fuch moving complaints as would have excited pity from everybreaft, but that of an enraged father. They gave him new attendants, having no confidence in those he had before, Hypolitus gave his friend money to reward the fidelity of his former fervants. and requested he would take care of them as they yet remained at his lordship's seat, being discharged from the earl of Douglas's fervice. Lord Sussex promised to do all in his power to serve and provide for them.

THE earl and counters of Douglas got into their carriage to return to London, and took with them the earl of Sussex, that Hypolitus might not have the least hopes of escaping a second time; and just as they set out, the vessel in which Hypolitus was embarked, faluted them with her cannon, and immediately fet fail on its voyage to Italy. Hypolitus overwhelmed with grief, caused a mattress to be laid on the deck, that he might behold his dear country as long as possible, fending a thousand fighs towards his dear JULIA. He frequently wished they may be overtaken by a form that would oblige them to put back, nor was it long before they were answered, being attacked by a most dreadful tempest the fifth day after their departure from England, which put them in imminent danger of perishing; all the skill and courage of the failors was of no use, the masts were bent like reeds, the rigging washed away, and the fails torn to pieces. The fea which was mountain high, feemed to fwallow them up: the crew who expected every moment would be their last, cried out in a most pitiful manner, befeeching heaven to have mercy on them. Hypo-LITUS alone less fearful than those that were accustomed to the sea, beheld their danger without the least emotion; he expected death with the greatest firmness, he even wished for it sometimes and his coolness was such that he was the only person on board capable of directing what was necessary to be done for their preservation.

K . 2.

Ar last the storm being abated, the sky became ferene, the hail and thunder ceased, and the fea grew calm; the damage which the veffel had fultained was foon repaired, and there was great need of it, as they were no sooner out of one danger than they fell into a much greater, which was the meeting of that formidable corfair DRAGUT RAIS. This pirate who was as well known as he was feared, when he perceived their veffel to be English made ready to engage them, and being come near enough, he commanded them to ftrike. Then it was that HYPOLITUS forgetting awhile his misfortunes, encouraged the captain to make a brave defence, he exhorted the failors and foldiers to fight like Britons, and his example alone, was fufficient to inspire the most pusillanimous with courage. The two vessels having cannonaded each other for some time, they made fast their grapling irons, and began a most desperate and bloody battle. HYPOLITUS was every where in attacking and defending, dealing death almost not have the least hopes of escaping a second time; and just as they set out, the vessel in which Hypolitus was embarked, faluted them with her cannon, and immediately fet fail on its voyage to Italy. Hypolitus overwhelmed with grief, caused a mattress to be laid on the deck, that he might behold his dear country as long as possible, fending a thousand fighs towards his dear JULIA. He frequently wished they may be overtaken by a form that would oblige them to put back, nor was it long before they were answered, being attacked by a most dreadful tempest the fifth day after their departure from England, which put them in imminent danger of perishing; all the skill and courage of the failors was of no use, the masts were bent like reeds, the rigging washed away, and the fails torn to pieces. The fea which was mountain high, feemed to fwallow them up: the crew who expected every moment would be their last, cried out in a most pitiful manner, befeeching heaven to have mercy on them. Hypo-LITUS alone less fearful than those that were accustomed to the sea, beheld their danger without the least emotion; he expected death with the greatest firmness, he even wished for it sometimes times as the only means of ending his misfortunes, and his coolness was such that he was the only person on board capable of directing what was necessary to be done for their preservation.

AT last the storm being abated, the sky became ferene, the hail and thunder ceased, and the fea grew calm; the damage which the veffel had fultained was foon repaired, and there was great need of it, as they were no fooner out of one danger than they fell into a much greater, which was the meeting of that formidable corfair DRAGUT RAIS. This pirate who was as well known as he was feared, when he perceived their veffel to be English made ready to engage them, and being come near enough, he commanded them to ftrike. Then it was that HYPOLITUS forgetting awhile his misfortunes, encouraged the captain to make a brave defence, he exhorted the failors and foldiers to fight like Britons, and his example alone, was sufficient to inspire the most pusillanimous with courage. The two vessels having cannonaded each other for some time, they made fast their grapling irons, and began a most desperate and bloody battle. HYPOLITUS was every where in attacking and defending, dealing death almost at every blow, and he flew as one may fay, from ftem to ftern; at last he leaped into the enemy's ship, and though he was followed only by a small number of foldiers, the fight of the dangers to which they faw him expose himself, inspired them with fuch courage, that nothing could ftop them; and the Turks were fo much amazed at their intrepidity, that though DRAGUT RAIS made a most gallant defence, yet seeing he must either be killed or taken, fought his fafety by flight, and taking advantage of the general confusion, he gave the necessary orders for quitting the English vessel. nor was it difficult to execute them, because while HYPOLITUS was on board the corfair, he perceived an officer of the Turks on board the English ship, who killed or wounded almost every person that dared approach him, forming a kind of breaft-work with the dead bodies in fuch a manner that none had the boldness to attack him. Hypolitus being inspired with a noble emulation, returned to his own vessel, that he might attack this valiant stranger, and just as they began a most furious combat, the corfair filled her fails and went off before the wind. This at once put an end to the contest between these two brave men ;

K 3

men; they were both wounded, and he who belonged to the corfair finding himself abandoned by his companions, had no choice but to surrender, and esteeming Hypolitus as the most worthy of being his protector, "Deal with me," said he in English, "as I have always dealt with those of your nation, some of whom have had reason to praise my good offices towards them." I hope," replied Hypolitus, "that you in return, will have the same reason to think as kindly of mine."

HE went immediately to feek the captain, and requested him to take particular care of this brave man, whose courage deserved the highest admiration. "We owe the same to you," replied the captain, " as without you, we should " not have made fuch a glorious refutance; there-" fore you may give what orders you please in " regard to the stranger, at whose fate you feem " to be fo greatly interested, and all I desire is, " that you will first think of your own preser-" vation, as you are wounded, have yourfelf ex-" amined without delay." Hypolitus thanked him for this politeness as it deserved, and finding himself weak with the loss of blood, was obliged to lie down; but he was no fooner in bed than unealy being uneasy for his prisoner, he sent for him, and ordered a bed to be prepared for him in his own cabbin, desired him to take some repose, and let his wounds be dressed; but neither of their wounds were dangerous, and if Hypolitus had no other ailment than this, he would have soon been persectly well; but the moment that the usual tranquillity was restored on board the ship, he relapsed into his former melancholy, and his prisoner heard him frequently complain in these words: "Ah! "Julia, Julia, I have lost all in losing you, and nothing will ever make me amends for your absence!"

In was not very difficult for Muley (so the valiant stranger was called) after hearing those complaints often repeated, to guess that Hypolitus was in love, and forely afflicted. Muley was not very young, but he was perfectly well made, his features were manly and regular, his shape elegant, his wit lively and piercing, with the utmost politeness in his manner. "I cannot "imagine," said Hypolitus to him one day, "how a person that has followed the occupation of a pirate, can be so well bred, and of such "a mild disposition, which seems to be ill suited.

and

WD

let

nds

her

er-

n-

ed

ird

hl

u, ur.

Ce

-

Ľ

1

" to the life you have led." MULEY, fighing profoundly, told him, that people were not always mafters of their fate; that it was true, heaven had not destined him to be a pirate, and that his being one was owing to the tyrranny of DRA-GUT RAIS. This answer had a very extraordinaeffect, by exciting Hypolitus's curiofity, he, who fince his departure from his dear Julia, had been incapable of any amusement, now felt a most pressing defire of being better acquainted with his prisoner; " I know not who you are," continued he, "but you appear to me to be greatly superior " to what you would have one believe; if you " will be ingenuous and trust me with your se-" cret, you will lay me under very great obliga-" tions, and you may rely both on my fecrecy " and friendship." "I claim them both," replied MULEY, tenderly embracing him, " and I dare "venture to affure you that I am one of lord " Douglas (your father's) best friends; my " first care was to enquire your name, and I look " on our thus meeting as a kind of miracle." While he spoke thus, Hypolitus examined him with greater attention than he did at first, and found fo great a resemblance between him and his " dear

dear Julia, both in his air and features as quite. confounded him, " Ah!" faid he at last, " pri-" thee do not any longer deny me the pleasure of " knowing who you are." "You can only have " remembered my name," continued MULEY, " and may perhaps, have sometimes heard talk of " my misfortunes. I am the earl of WARWICK " who was thought to have perished in the fer-" vice of the Venetians, about fourteen years " ago." Hypolitus appeared fo transported with joy, that the earl of WARWICK, (for it realwas he) was greatly furprized, and could not possibly account for it; but as foon as they were a. little recovered, Hypolitus by demonstrations of an extraordinary respect and tenderness, informed him of his having conceived for great a friendship for him that it could not possibly be the work of a fingle moment; he entreated him. to acquaint him with his adventures, because no. person could be more interested in them than himfelf.

"I CAN foon fatisfy your curiofity," faid the earl, "I am of the same religion as yourself, you are no stranger to my family; I was married to one of the most beautiful and virtuous women

" in the world, but fortune, jealous of the repole " and happiness I enjoyed in her company, was so " cruel as to separate us; I was unfortunately included in the accusation which was preferred " against one of my nearest relations whom the " king caused to be put to death, and being per-" fuaded that I had murmured against the injus-" tice, I foon became the object of his hatred, therefore to avoid the like fate of my kinfman, " I was obliged to leave my spouse and the kingdom immediately. I left with this virtuous woman a daughter named Julia who was then but two years old, and was infinitely dear to me." If the earl of WARWICK had at that moment obferved Hypolitus he would have eafily known by the changes of his countenance that he was greatly affected at the mention of that name, but his attention being taken up by his narrative he continued in these words " I set out for Venice where I met general CAPELLO, with whom I " embarked for Corfu, where we joined the con-" federate fleet. We attacked BARBAROSSA. and being honoured with the command of a galley, I attacked feveral times the famous " corfair DRAGUT RAIS, and happily for us " though

" though not for him, I killed his brother Zin-" KING RAIS (whom he loved as his life) with " my own hand; he fwore vengeance against me, " and to effect it, as we were in the gulph of Lar-" to, where prince DORIA had reassembled his " gallies and retreated in a manner that furprized " every one, and for which there was not the least " necessity, DRAGUT RAIS fired with hatred " against me, would not let slip this favourable " opportunity of my being left behind to attack " me, but ordered his fquadron to furround my " galley, and by that means cut off my retreat; " finding myself thus encompassed with enemies, " though I was affifted by one of our gallies, yet " I could not long refift the numbers that attack-" ed me, and having done every thing in my " power to break the enemies line, I at last grew o fo weak with the wounds I received, that no " longer able to support myself, I fell into the " fea. DRAGUT RAIS who observed this, caused " me to be taken up immediately, sparing my life at that time only to wreck all his fury on me, and " thus revenge the death of his brother; and I " was kept chained in the hold of the galley, " where I fuffered more than it is possible for hu-" man nature to imagine,

h

is

d

A

d

e

k

ıy

;

"He would never consent to my seeking the means of paying my ransom; four years were elapsed, when after a severe engagement he took an English vessel, all my forrows were renewed at seeing so many of my countrymen reduced to misery like mysels. I enquired of some of them, but with the greatest caution, how affairs went in England, and particularly of my dear spouse. There chanced to be amongst the prisoners a person whom she had taken into her fervice after my departure, and who remained with her till the day of her death, a most dread"ful day to me, and which I cannot think of without shedding a torrent of teats.

THE earl of WARWICK was so greatly oppressed with grief that it was some time before he could continue his narration, but at last recovering a little from the disorder into which the remembrance of his grief had thrown him, he proceeded in these words: "From this person I learnt that "lady WARWICK having received an account of my death, which she imagined was but too true, "it had such a violent effect on her constitution that it immediately threw her into a distemper L "which

" which put an end to her life in a few days, " and to add to my forrows, the dreadful reci-" tal was followed with an account of the death " of my daughter soon after her unfortunate mo-" ther! that lovely child who was fo dear to me. " and who alone was capable of reconciling me " once more to life, after the lofs of my dear " spouse. This last stroke completed the measure " of my woes, and I became infensible to such a " degree, that DRAGUT RAIS began at last to be " displeased, when he found the dread of his " wrath had no longer any effect on me, and I " grew so indifferent with regard to all my mis-" fortunes, that in the hold, where I was con-" fined, and which is a fort of tomb, I consider-" ed myfelf, (thus loaded with chains, but more " by my misfortunes) as one doomed to a speedy " death. How did I not reproach myself for ha-" ying left my wife and daughter! Just heaven, " faid I, if only one of them had been spared, I " should have had at least some fort of consola-" tion, out alas! I have lost my all, and though " I am not fo happy as to be at rest, yet I can " fcarce be ranked among the living.

" Ir would be trespassing too much on your pa" tience, should I trouble you any longer with the " recital of my misfortunes, and it will be fuffi-" cient to acquaint you, that after a dreadful cap-" tivity of eight years, DRAGUT RAIS at last re-" membered my being his prisoner (for I am now " convinced he had entirely forgot me) defired and " to see me, but as soon as I was brought into the " fresh air, I fainted away. Come, said he, to " me when I was recovered, come WARWICK, " take courage, I am refolved to restore to you " your arms; but you must first swear to me by " the most solemn oath amongst you christians, " that you will only use them for my service and " defence, against all those whom I shall attack, " without exception. If thou wilt confent to this, " continued he, offering me his hand, I will en-" gage my word that thou shalt be as much ho-" noured here as myself; nay more, thou shalt " even command, and share in my fortune. And " to convince thee, thou shalt henceforth wear " my habit, and change thy name to that of " Muley, because, it is agreeable to me. The " offers you make me, replied I, cannot tempt " me in the least; as to riches Ldespise them, and " the command on which you fet so great a value, L2 " I think

" I think beneath me to accept, but if the fervices " I may possibly render thee, will make me obtain. " my liberty, tell me in what time wilt thou grant " it, and how much must I pay thee for my ran-" fom? At the end of ten years, faid he, it will " cost thee a thousand crowns, during which time " thou shalt promise to serve me faithfully. I ac-" cepted this proposal, which was the reason of. " my being obliged to fight when he attacked? " your vessel, having promised him to do so, I " could not break it, though all my wishes were-" for your success; but heaven at last was pleased " you should put him to slight, and by that means " shorten my captivity by several years. I did. " not think it proper to discover myself to your " companions, least they might have a bad opinion " of my having taken arms in defence of the " corfair, against the English, but the high opini-" on I have of your honour, affures me you will. " not abuse my confidence."

"I esteem myself perfectly happy, in your good:

"opinion of me," said Hypolitus, "and be:

"assured, I shall never abuse so great a proof of "your friendship and esteem; nor could you have:

"chosen a person more proper than myself, as I

a can

acan immediately repay the obligation, by acquainting you with good news, and as true as it will be agreeable, in which, you, my lord, are greatly interested." He then began to relate all that concerned the fair Julia, and though he did not make his lordship acquainted with his great love for her, yet the lively manner in which he spoke, and the passionate description he gave of her person, added to the profound sighs and complaints which the earl now remembered to have heard him utter at night, when he pronounced the name of Julia, convinced him that Hypolitus was violently in love with her.

Nothing could equal the surprise and joy which the earl of Warwick felt at hearing of his daughter's being alive, though assured to the contrary by the person who lived with the countess of Warwick; it was an additional pleasure to him, to hear that no care had been wanting in her education, and that she was one of the most beautiful and accomplished young ladies in England. So great was his longing to see this dear child, that if he had met with a vessel bound to London, and had been at liberty, he would not have delayed one moment in going thither; he enquired quired concerning the flate of religion in England; and what passed in the government. Hypolitus. informed him that it was not long fince JOHN DUDLEY, duke of NORTHUMBERLAND affumed the title of earl of WARWICK, that he had accufed EDWARD SEYMOUR the king's uncle, and protector of England, with going to his housewith intention to affaffinate him, and under that: pretence had formed fuch a strong party by the affistance of the duke of SUMMERSET, that SEY-MOUR at last fell a victim to the rage of his enemies, and was put to death, together with his wife, and feveral noblemen; and that the duke of NORTHUMBERLAND who usurped an absolute power, had caused his son to be married to princess JANE, niece to HENRY VIII, pretending that fhe would fucceed to the crown, which made people imagine they had poisoned the young king-EDWARD. That this prince who was but lately, dead, and of whom great expectations were formed, made a will in favour of JANE, and utterly excluded princess Many his own fifter; but her just right prevailing over the king's intentions, she was using her utmost endeavours, and worked with great zeal and fuccess in establishing the Roman Catholic religion, when he left England, THE

THE earl of WARWICK having feriously reflected on what Hypolitus told him, thought it expedient for him to return to Venice to recover himself from the fatigues of such a long and painful captivity, which he fuffered in defence of that republic. He was perfectly easy at his daughter's being with lady Dauglas, as he looked on the care her ladyship had so generously taken of her fince her infancy, as fo many proofs of the continuance of her regard, and not having the least notion of her affairs being in fuch a fituation as to oblige her to abandon her protectress, he determined only to write them an account of his being alive, and in the interim to make use of the interest of his friends at Venice, to procure him some employment. He acquainted Hypolitus with his intentions, who was not forry that he was not to go fo foon to England. " Perhaps," faid Hy-POLITUS to his gentleman, in whom he had some confidence, though appointed by his father, " per-" haps if the earl of WARWICK was in London " they would press him to force Julia to marry " the earl of BEDFORD, and she would be more " embarraffed in relifting the commands of her fa-" ther,

" ther, than in defending herfelf against the im-" portunities of mine, and while I am absent, it " will be more to my advantage that he should " likewife be fo." Those reasons made him endeayour to confirm the earl of WARWICK in the resolutions he had formed, and from this hour they entered into the strictest bonds of friendthip imaginable: the only difference in this new amity was that Hypolitus paid fo much respect to the earl of WARWICK, as furprized all those who were not acquainted with the true motive, HYPOLITUS generously divided his purse with his friend, regarding what remained a prefent made him by the earl, as he would have had his lordthip take the whole fum which was very considerable, well knowing that by ferving the father of his dear Julia, he did what was highly agreeable to her, as there was nothing in his power which he would not have undertaken to oblige the earl.

THE defire of being useful to the earl of WARwick, suspended for a time his forrows, and the society of such an agreeable friend served to soften his mortal inquietude. They arrived at Leghorn after a pleasant voyage, and on their leaving m

it

ld

n+

e

Ir

the vessel, the captain acquainted Hypolitus, that he transferred to him all his interest in the ransom of Muley, not knowing him to be an Englishman, nor was Hypolitus wanting in generosity to the captain, to whom he presented a ring, worth four hundred pistoles, telling him at the same time, that he wished it was in his power to pay him a much greater ransom for a person he esteemed so much, as well as to acknowledge the many civilities he had received while on board his ship.

On their arrival at Leghorn, HYPOLITUS requested the earl of Warwick to write to Julia; this tender parent who needed no intreaties to do what was so agreeable to himself, complied with all his heart, acknowledging at the same time, his obligations to the earl and counters of Douglas, to whom he gave an account of all that had happened to him, affuring them of his gratitude for the favours they had conferred on his dear daughter. Hypolitus enclosed a letter for his father in that of his lordship's, not forgetting to write to his friend the earl of Sussex, to whom he enclosed a letter to his dear Julia, and one for Lucilla. He did not expect an answer from them till his arrival at Florence, at which place he was to reside, by the orders of his father, from whom he carried a letter to the senator ALBERTI, to whose friendship he was strongly recommended. The earl of WARWICK and HYPOLITUS made no stay at Leghorn, but set out immediately for Florence.

WHILE HYPOLITUS thus languished at being absent from his mistress, she enjoyed neither health or tepose, and grief had wrought so great a change in her, that she was scarce to be known; instead of going abroad, she remained shut up alone in her chamber; her only consolation was in conversing with her dear Lucilla or the earl of Sussex, which happened but seldom, least they should give new cause of suspicion to lord Douglas who would absolutely have forbid his visits.

THE earl of BEDFORD after being in as much danger as it was possible to be without dying, his mother who only wished to bring him from the house of lord Douglas where he remained ever since his having fought with Hypolitus, caused a litter to be made for him, and as soon as he was in a condition to be removed without danger, she had him brought to London; but before his departure

parture from Buckingham, he defired to speak with lord and lady DougLAS, and asked their permission to take leave of Julia, but he could not obtain his request, as she persisted in refusing him, notwithstanding all the intreaties of lord and lady Douglas, to prevail on her to comply; nor would she give them any other answer but that the was resolved to leave the world for ever, and requested they would conduct her to a convent; but though she was so pressing, yet they did not imagine that this was her real intention, therefore would not comply with her defires, as they feared if they carried her to France, that HYPOLITUS would eafily find means to fee her, which would entirely disconcert all their schemes, and thus fometimes under pretence of great tenderness to her, and at others by a formal denial, they gave her to understand that she must either remain where the was, or marry.

SUCH undeserved severity renewed all her griefs,

"am I then a prisoner, my dear sister?" said she

"to LUCILLA, "and shall I not be permitted

"to pass my time in solitude, and be at liberty to

"induse myself in melancholy ressections on my missortunes, or must I be for ever on my guard

"and

" and fludy to conceal my inquietude, and be " obliged to fee a thousand people whose presence " is either troublesome or affecting to me? alas! " to what new miseries am I doomed? others are " at liberty to make choice of that state which " is refused to me ! and so far are they from be-" ing opposed in their desires of going into a con-" vent, that they are frequently forced into one " against their inclinations; but for me alone are " referved those new torments; and one would " imagine that my misfortunes gave great plea-" fure to those who have caused them." All these different reflections afflicted her to fuch a degree that though she was remarkable for the natural fweetness of her temper, she at last became peevish and fretful, though LUCILLA did all in her power to alleviate her grief by sharing it with her, and this lovely maid equally wife and discreet urged every argument that she imagined would alleviate her forrows, and omitted nothing which she thought. would give her the least pleasure.

MEAN while HYPOLITUS arrived at Florence, where he found the senator Alberti ready to do him all the services in his power. A few days after his arrival, he and the earl of WARWICK

0

e

1

re

h

e-

1-

e

e

d

(e

e

1

h

T

d

t.

were conducted to the fenator's country feat at which place taste and magnificence seemed to vie with each other. Count de Medicis, the reigning duke, came there at the same time to pass a few days; he was greatly concerned that the earl of WARWICK would not remain at Florence, and gave Hypolitus such a kind reception at his palace, as might have flattered his ambition, had he been so disposed, but his grief at being absent from Julia drove every other thought from his mind; and all those he saw at the grand duke's, were furprised at the deep melancholy with which his countenance was continually overcast, and even he himself perceived it, but as it was not in his power to conceal it, he contented himself with requesting the fenator ALBERTI to remain as little. as possible at court.

Hypolytus being now at a distance, lord and lady Douglas began to enjoy some repose, and if they were at times a little uneasy, it was by being over anxious for the success of the scheme they had formed to intercept all the letters that were written by the lovers; as it was with design to discover in what manner they would carry on their correspondence that lord Douglas gave liberty to his fon to fee JULIA before his departure, and by means of one of the contess's women who was concealed behind the hangings of the apartment they were in, he was informed that Hypo-LITUS'S letters were to be directed to lord Sussex, and as it was necessary that those letters should be intercepted, a talk not very difficult to one that was determined on it, and would spare no expence to accomplish his defign, his lordship engaged one of the clerks of the post office in his interest, and by his affirtance was affured of receiving every letter that came from Italy directed to lord Sus-SEX; and on the other hand he wrote to the English envoy at Florence (who was his intimate friend) desiring he would intercept all letters that were directed for his fon, giving him to understand in general that he was in love with a person that had no fortune, which was the reason of his sending him abroad, to try if absence would cure him; and that he was under the necessity of using every stratagem he could think of, to recal him to his duty; therefore he conjured him to affift him in all that lay in his power, because his son's fortune depended entirely on the fuccess of his schemes.

THE first packet which lord DougLas received was

was directed to himself, and came from Leghorn, it contained letters from Hypolitus and the earl of WARWICK; he was greatly furprised at hearing that Julia's father had not been killed, as was believed by those who knew him, and yet he could not doubt his being alive on account of the letter he had just received. He did not think it proper to acquaint Julia, with this good news, " She will," faid he to his lady, " make use of " this pretence to oppose our desires if any match " should offer, and might say it was necessary to " wait the return or at least the consent of her " father; and as he himself writes me that he " has great obligations to Hypolitus, who " doubtless has acquainted him with his love for " JULIA, her father will never act contrary to the " interest of his friend." They therefore comcluded; that it was impossible for JULIA to be informed of what related to her father, and determined to make use of the means they had concerted, to cross those tender and too unfortunate lovers. The earl of Douglas after intercepting the first packet that came directed to lord Sussex, caused another to be written in its place, as if from Hypolitus, in which were inclosed letters letters for his friend, for Lucilla; and his mistress, acquainting them that being attacked by a corfair, in his passage to Leghorn, he had the misfortune of being wounded in his right hand, which obliged him to get a friend to write his letters; this was done to accustom them betimes with feeing a hand writing so different from his, and because it was necessary, in the beginning, to prevent their having the least fuspicion of the cheat; the letter which was intended for Julia, was wrote in the tenderest manner possible, as were alfo those for lord Sussex and LUCILLAS

LORD DOUGLAS did not omit writing to HY-POLITUS as if from JULIA, his fifter, and friend, which letters were written in fuch a manner as to perfuade him they came from them, and to remove his doubts on account of their not being wrote by those persons, they acquainted him that they had taken a refolution to disguise their writing, that if any of their letters should be loft, no person could tell who were the parties that wrote them.

His lordship wrote at the same time to the English envoy at Florence, requesting him to stop those letters which were written by lord Sussex, but to let Hypotitus receive the others, fending him at the fame time an impression of the seal with which they were to be fealed, conjuring him to let him receive only fuch letters and to fend the others back to him; being by these means entirely master of all the letters that passed between Julia and her lover, he now thought of putting the finishing stroke to his schemes. Their letters by degrees became more cool and referved which greatly afflicted the tender Julia, "Ah! my dear " fifter," faid she to LUCILLA,. " your brother: " loves me no longer; observe with what indif-" ference he writes; he even milles many oppor-" tunities without writing a fingle line, and when " he does, it feems as if I extorted from him "those weak testimonies of his love and remem-" brance; his heart is no longer mine, and it is " good manners alone that makes him continue to " write to me. Ah! my fifter, he is quite changed, " he is no longer the fame Hypolitus as formerly." In this manner did she vent her forforrows, which pierced her very foul! Lucit-LA would willingly have undertaken to justify her brother, had it been in her power, but the was fo well convinced of his inconstancy, by his own Ma letters.

letters, (as she imagined) that she was almost as angry as JULIA.

WHILE those two lovely friends passed their nights in tears and lamentations, filling their letters with a thousand reproaches against the unfortunate Hypolitus, his mind was not more tranquil than theirs. Before the earl of WARWICK fet out for Venice, he acquainted him with his passion for Julia, and told him without disguise of his father's anger against him, and finally he engaged his lordship so much in his interest as to make him promise that this lovely maid should be his wife; but in vain did he-write this agreeable news to his miftress, who was not permitted to see it, but received in its place a letter that overwhelmed her with grief; and Hypolitus himfelf began to take notice that her letters were written in fuch a cool and conftrained manner, as greatly elarmed him-

Ir has been before remarked that he had received many marks of efteem and friendship, from the fenator ALBERTI; this fenator had a fon nearly of the fame age as HYPOLITUS; he was called fignior LEANDER, was extremely agreeable, well made made, sprightly, sweet tempered, courteous, and had fomething very engaging in his manner. The dispositions of those two young gentlemen were so much alike, that they entered at first fight into a friendship which death only could dissolve; there temained no longer any fecrets between them, and they communicated their thoughts to each other without the least reservo. It is easy to believe that in such a tender friendship as this, Hypo-LITUS made him the confidant of his love for JULIA, and he took fo much pleasure in speaking of her, that LEANDER was near falling in love at the bare description, " Nothing in the world is fo lovely," faid HYPOLYTUS, " nor can her per-" fections be equalled, and flie has befides a " greatness of foul, and most enchanting sweet-" ness in her manner." " How happy you are, " my dear Hypolitus," faid Leander, " in " being beloved by fuch an accomplished woman; " as to me, I have not as yet tafted the pleasures " of a tender engagement, for hitherto I have " only had some occasional gallantries with wo-" men who take delight in having many ad-" mirers at once, for whom they have not the " least regard and of consequence u'e them with cruelty." " Ah! what a dangerous situation

" is this," faid Hypolitus, "I was in love with.

"Julia before I well knew myself, nor was I

"then acquainted with the greatness of my passion for her; therefore it can not be by my "own experience, that I ever detested such wo men as those you speak of; but I must consels

"they appear to me so destructive and artful,

that I have great compassion for those who are

" fo unfortunate as to fall into their fnares."

HYPOLITUS also made fignior LEANDER examine the beauty of the true-lovers knot which he received from Julia, killing it often, with great marks of transport and veneration, and he waited? the coming of those days on which the post arrived, with the utmost impatience, but though he took care to get his letters as foon as possible, yet the English envoy was so faithful to lord Dove-LAS, that he always received the false ones instead. of the others; and his vexation encreased as he found her letters written in fuch a cool manner, which he was convinced he never deserved; " know," faid he, to fignior LEANDER with an air of fadness, " the effects of absence, and the " longer mine becomes, the more does Julia neglect me. Ah! too cruel absence how hast " thou

"thou injured me, by depriving me of the heart of my dear miftress."

LEANDER would have perfuaded him to go to Rome, and from thence to Venice, to amuse himself: " No my friend," said Hypolitus, " I will not ftir from hence; all my father defired " was that I should leave England; and Florence " is nearer to it than those places you mention; as " to their beauty, I am quite indifferent, and while I am absent from her I love, I shall be " infensible to every other object; all my thoughts " being entirely engroffed by my love for that " amiable maid, and though I shall never cease " adoring her, yet you fee how she kills me with " her neglect," " And this," replied LEANDER. " is the reason why I would have you seek some " little amusement, and endeavour to forget for a " time this deep melancholy which makes you " shun company; and I can no longer conceal " from you, that you are regarded at court as " quite impolite, every body alks me the reason, " part cularly the ladies. Endeavour at leaft, " my dear friend, to be a little more fociable." "I cannot, nor will I be any other than I am," replied Hypolitus, " leave me, my dear LE-" ANDER.

- " ANDER, leave me I beseech you at liberty to
- " bewail my misfortunes, which alas is a pleafure
- " that few people need envy me."

Twelve months were now elapsed, and lord DougLAS applauded himself greatly that his schemes had succeeded so well, as not to be in the least suspected, but found by all his son's letters that fell into his hands, as well as by those of JULIA, which were fent to him from Italy, that absence had not made the least alteration in their hearts, their love being as violent as ever, and it was evident by their letters, that even death itself was not capable of changing their fentiments; his lordship therefore, fearing least some unlucky difcovery would undo what had cost him so much pains, and in which he was refolved to perfift, went immediately to the ambaffador of Florence, and having acquainted him with the vexations which his fon had caused him by a passion that: neither time or his commands had been able todestroy, he conjured him to lend his affistance in a project which he had formed, and finding him ready to serve him, they wrote a letter as from Hypolitus, another as if from the English envoy at Florence, a third from the marquis of NE-

MI, and the last as from the senator ALBERTI. These letters were wrote as if Hypolitus defired his father's permission to marry madamoiselle de Neri, a maid of quality, whose father was allied to feveral of the first families in Italy, and who as she was an only child would have an immense fortune. A picture supposed to be her's was likewise inclosed in this packet, which being entirely left to the painter's fancy, he drew fuch a compleat beauty that it was impossible to behold it without admiration; the letter wrote in the name of senator ALBERTI acquainted his lordship in confidence of his fon's being fo deeply enamoured with this lovely maid, that a refufal of his confent would absolutely prove fatal to him; that of the English envoy acquainted lord Dove-LAS. of the immense fortune of the lady; and that of the marquis de Next was merely a letter of compliment, and only hinted that as his daughter had so great a liking to Hypolitus, he could no longer refuse his consent to both their solicitations, and that if the match was agreeable, he would esteem the being allied to his lordship as a very great honour.

This scheme being ready to be put in execution,

one day as lord Sussex, was at dinner with the earl of Douglas, a gentleman came from the ambassador of Florence, intimating that his master defired an audience of lord Douglas. His lordthip replied that his excellency's time should be his and expected the honour of feeing him some time, that day. The ambaffador came foon after, and Julia who always retired at the approach of company was going to withdraw, but as this scene was to be acted for her alone, the countess told her in a low voice that she and LUCILLA must out of good manners remain with her; when the first compliments were passed, the ambassador gave his lordship to understand that he had business of the utmost importance to acquaint him with concerning his fon; his lordship told him he might speak without referve fince only his mother, fifters and most intimate friend were present. The ambassador who performed his part to admiration, prefented him with a packet of letters, which at first he read feemingly to himself, but soon after raising his voice: "As there are none but friends pre-" fent," faid he, " I shall make no secret of this " affair." He then read his letters, and opening the box which contained the picture, feemed greaty greatly surprised at the beauty of mademoiselle de NERI; the countess was quite charmed with it, and the ambaffador having extolled her good qualities, requested his lordship would permit him to give a favourable answer; that the felicity of two fuch perfect lovers might not be retarded. But how is it possible to express the emotions of the unfortunate JULIA during this cruel conversation, who making an effort to recover her dejecton of spirits asked to see the picture of her supposed rival, but as soon as she had cast her eyes on the fatal object, it appeared so very beautiful that her grief encreased, and she fell from her feat without sense or motion. This sad spectacle would have excited compassion from people less tender than lord and lady Douglas, who feemed not in the least disturbed at it, but ordered her to be conveyed to her chamber, where LUCILLA and the earl of Sussex attended her, both drowned in tears, and though every remdy was used to recover her from her fit, it was four hours before they were certain of her being alive.

AT last she opened her eyes and looked at them very steadfastly, but without speaking, or shedding a tear and immediately shut them again. "My " dearest fister," faid Lucilla tenderly embracing her, " your misfortunes are not without a " remedy, and he will repent of his inconstancy; " if he returns to his duty, furely you will not " fo: fake him, and should he prove ungrateful " he will not deserve this tenderness; will you " therefore die because of his ingratitude, and " leave me thus in despair?" Lord Sussex joined his entreaties to those of LUCILLA, but JULIA did not shew the least sign of her having heard them, and it growing late, the earl of Sussex was obliged to take his leave, without an opportunity of speaking to her. LUCILLA sat up with her, weeping most bitterly the whole night. Lord Sussex returned next day and LUCILLA acquainted him that JULIA absolutely resuled to take any food, nor could they by the most pressing entreaties, prevail on her to open her eyes or speak a fingle word. Lord Sussex waited on lord and lady Douglas, neither of whom feemed in the least surprised, or touched with the unhappy. Iv-LIA's despair, though caused by themselves, but told his lordship with the greatest indifference that hunger would foon oblige her to eat, and that lovers generally had less appetite than other people; " How," faid the earl of Sussex, in a fevere were tone, "do you add infult to the other misfortunes which you have caused this lovely maid to suffer; be assured that this unjust proceeding will one day cause you to blush, and you will, when it is too late repent of your cruelty!" he added more reproaches to those, but seeing they had no effect, he returned with a heavy heart to Julia's apartment.

JULIA being greatly pressed by LUCILLA and lord Sussex to take fome little nourishment, at last opened her eyes, and addressing herself to them in a feeble voice, frequently interrupted with fighs, " My dearest fister, and you my generous " friend," faid she, " do not I beseech you, press " me to eat; I am greatly obliged to you for your " care, and those marks you have given me of " your tenderness and friendship, but I truft, I shall " foon fee the end of my deplorable life. Ah! " barbarous Hypolitus!" cried she, bursting into tears, " what have I done to deserve such " cruel treatment! where now are thy oaths, thy " vows, and promises of eternal fidelity! Alas! " you love me no more, thou faithless man, and " I am fo weak as to be afflicted at it!-" Having spoke thus with great emotion, she be-N 2 3 came came more obstinate than ever; she absolutely refused to take any nourishment, which made them partly guess her design, and as she had not eat for two days, they thought it highly necessary to endeavour to awaken her conscience, which was very delicate; they therefore fent for her confessor, and after speaking with him in private, left her alone with him. His exhortations had more influence than all the tears and entreaties of Lu-CILLA and lord Sussex : The foon became obedient to his admonitions, and when he had taken leave, " Do not," faid she to her fister, and his lordship, "be offended at my having so obstinately " denied your request, believe me it was not the " want of friendship which was the cause, but " merely the effect of my despair; as I have " fince been told that it is not permitted me to " fhorten my days, and that I shall be called to a " fevere account by the great Creator, who gave " me both life and being, for prefuming even to " think of it. I must then live," continued she, fighing profoundly, " but I shall live to be one of " the most wretched of human beings; nor shall " the ungrateful Hypolitus know the poig-" nant grief he has caused me. My dear fister," a dded added she, "if I may flatter myself with being "fill dear to you, give me one more proof of it, "never speak of me to your cruel brother; or if you must, tell him that his inconstancy did not in "the least move me; that indifference has now taken place of love, and that I did not so much as pronounce his name. And you my lord," continued she, "grant me the same request, do not I beseech you reveal my forrows; to you my fister, and to his lordship, I disclose them, but do not betray my considence." They both promised to comply, and were rejoyced to find that she would now think of preserving a life so very dear to them,

Several days having passed in this manner, Lucilla and lord Sussex wrote Hypolitus letters full of the most cutting reproaches, and had their suspicions in regard of him been just, those letters would certainly have made his love for Julia return, but he was not permitted to receive them any more than those they had written before. Mean while Julia sometimes stattered her grief with the pleasing hope that her lover might yet repent and not sulfill his engagement, nor could the sorbear to acquaint Lucilla with these notions; "and though his crime is great," continued file, "I should find myself extreamly happy in for-" giving him if he would at last prove faithful, but " alas! the rare accomplishments of mademoiselle " de Neri makes me fear I have lost him for " ever." This reflection threw her again into a profound melancholy, nor would LUCILLA flatter her with hopes, which would only ferve to renew her tenderness. "You must forget Hypolitus, my " dear fifter," faid she, " he deserves your hatred " and though he is my brother, I cannot speak in " his favour," " Hate and forget him," replied Julia, "ah my fifter, am I then miftress of my " passions? is a foul impressed with a long habi-" tude of loving and being beloved, and a heart " entangled in the mazes of love, are thefe to be " cured in a moment? But know that the violence " of my love is fo great that though I am affu-" red of the loss of this faithless man, he is yet as " dear to me as ever, and being ingenious to torment myfelf I recal to my remembrance all his words and actions; he is for ever present to my " imagination; and that with fuch newly acquired " merit, as ferves only to encrease my forrows " No my dear fifter, no, there never can be fuch deplorable condition as mine, nor can you poffibly conceive all its horrors,"

N 3

-10

ut

lle

10

0-

er

er

ny

in

ed

ný

ni-

be

ce u-

28

r-

is יעו

ed

18

h

THE news of the pretended marriage being folemnized, which Julia dreaded fo much, came at lord Douglas's pleasure, but it served only to encrease the torments of this lovely maid as she hourly expected it, whatever notions her hopes might flatter her with, but as they were now entirely fled, she determined on retiring to a nunnery. there to languish during the rest of her days, but a sentiment of pride prevented her design. "How." faid she to LUCILLA, " shall I abandon the world " for fuch a faithless lover? he would then have " reason to imagine that my regret at losing him " had made me take that step; I cannot bear the " thought, and whatever pains it may cost me. I " will at least make him believe that I am con-" tent and happy, and fince the earl of BEDFORD " perseveres in his desires to espouse me, I will " facrifice my repose to my felf love." " Is it " possible, cried LUCILLA that you are serious in " what you fay, can you refolve to marry a person 4 for whom you have no esteem, and have you " reflected on the dreadful consequences which " may attend fuch an alliance?" " I have con-" fidered all," replied she with an air of fadness, and I also consider that it will at least prevent " your

" your brother's being acquainted with my weak-" nefs, he will imagine that my love for him has " changed, as well as his for me, and I sha'l have " fome fort of pleafure in the thought of his be-" lieving that I have been before hand with him." All LUCILLA's reasons and entreaties were useless on this occasion, and as lady Douglas missed no opportunity of being acquainted with JULIA's fentiments, the moment she discovered that she was disposed to marry the earl of BEDFORD, she immediately informed his lordship of this change in his favour; nor did her ladyship omit any thing in her power to continue her in those sentiments, " My dear child," faid she, " though you do not " feem at present to have any great love for the " earl of BEDFORD, you are so virtuous, and " he adores you, if I may use the expression, " in fo uncommon a manner, that your duty as " well as your gratitude, will have as much effect " in his favour, as your violent love for another." Julia listened with filent attention, but when she replied she contented herself with telling her ladyship, that now she was resolved to become his wife, she hoped she should fulfil all her duties. The necessary preparations for the ceremony were made with the greatest haste; and the fatal day Being

k-

23

va

C-

-

d

4

2

e

9

being arrived, Julia appeared in a white brocade with filver flowers, trimmed with a pink and filver lace, her stomacher, ear-rings and necklace were diamonds, her fine hair was adorned with flowers, and she never looked so languishingly charming; a paleness which did not ill become her, her lovely eyes full of foftness on account of her grief, in fine all this together, rather added to, than diminished her charms. The earl of Bep-FORD appeared so happy that he almost doubted the reality of his good fortune; nor could he contain his transports, but all his protestations of love and constancy had not the least effect on the lovely JULIA. Their marriage was celebrated at Buckingham; the company were numerous, and brilliant; her melancholy was remarked by every one; some were displeased at her cool behaviour, as the scarce made any reply either to the serious or lively conversations that was addressed to her.

THE earl of BEDFORD was made acquainted on the day of his marriage with every circumstance relating to Julia's birth, lord Douglas not judging it proper to marry her as his own child, though he wished this secret might never be known, and that he might yet continue to pass for her father, as he had done till now. The earl of Beproap. instead of going to London with his lady conducted her to Berkshire, where he had a most magnificent feat, refembling a palace more than the house of a subject, as nature and art joined in. encreasing its beauties. Its situation was most delightful, and though it was but forty miles from. London, it seemed to be at a much greater difrance on account of its being almost intirely furrounded with a wood, and though there were many noblemens feats in this county, yet they were. not very near. It was to this folitude that the unfortunate Julia accompanied her spouse; she requested lady Douglas to permit Lucilla to live with her for fome time to keep her company, and obtained her request. " I did not imagine," faid fhe to LUCILLA, " that my miseries could " encrease, thinking after what I had suffered, it, " was impossible to endure more; but alas! my " dear Lucilla, how am I deceived when every " moment brings with it an encrease of trouble, " and then the horrid conftraint I am obliged to " appear under to a husband I cannot love; the " reproaches which my heart still tortures me with, the remorfes which follow the tender re-" membrance of a person yet beloved, the desire es of of doing my duty, as well as to erase from my heart an inclination, I cannot have without a crime, all these together are so terrible and affect me in such a manner, that I am at times in dread of being tempted to commit some desperate action: when I was unmarried then at least I was not ashamed of my own thoughts.

Just heaven! what torments should I suffer was I to remain long in this dreadful situation. In fpeaking these words she wept most bitterly.
Lucilla mingled tears with her, and though she endeavoured all in her power to alleviate the grief
of her friend, yet she could not succeed.

In the midst of all his pleasure the earl of Bedford could not but know that he was not beloved, and though love is generally said to be blind, yet it is quick and penetrating and easily finds the difference between that which proceeds from complaisance, and that from inclination; it may flatter and endeavour to deceive itself, but there is a certain delicacy of manners which affects the heart when the flame is mutual, that the other can never attain to, and when one of the parties only is passionately in love, they frequently pass many disagreeable moments, and give great disquiet to the object beloved. The earl of BEDFORD was in this fituation, and in those moments of inquietude endeavoured to discover what could thus deprive him of his lady's tenderness; but his efforts were without effect, as she was so very difcreet, regarding every one with fuch indifference; and besides she led such a retired life, as at last convinced him, that if fhe was not passionately fond of him, she did not at least love any other person. " Time will perhaps make me happy," faid he to one of his most intimate friends, " Ju-" LIA feems at present insensible to love, but " when her hour is come, I doubt not but she " will then perform from motives of tenderness, " what she now does to fulfil her duty and fatis-" fy her virtue,

THREE months were now elapsed since Lu-CILLA and the earl of Sussex had written to Hypolitus, they were so incensed at his inconstancy that they could not think of forgiving him, and lord Sussex was more angry if possible than Lucilla; being a man of such strict honour, that he could not conceive how one of Hypolitus's birth and education could possibly break his word, and it was this which irritated him against his friend.

THE earl of DOUGLAS having now no longer occasion for the assistance of the British envoy at Florence, wrote him a letter of thanks for the trouble he had taken in stopping all the letters that were directed to his fon, and defiring him for the future to let them take their course, as there was no longer occasion for having them intercepted. But this was not of the least advantage to Hypo-LITUS, because those from whom he expected letters were in no humour to write to him at prefent, which threw him into an inexpressible inquietude. A thousand times he was on the point of returning to England, if fignior LEANDER had not made use of every argument his wit could invent to detain him. One evening when he did not chuse to fee company, not even his frend LEANDER, he took a walk out of the city, follwing some time the course of the river Arno, but going a little aside, he entered a wood where the orange, myrtles, and pomgranate trees formed a continual foring; he walked flowly along the path, and foon after ftruck anto the most retired part of the wood, where finding himfelf at liberty, he began to figh and lament his cruel fate at being thus forgotten by his miftress, his fister and friend, and at last determined to set out next day, when his gentleman (who was no stranger to his uneasiness at not having received letters from England) brought him a packet which he had just received from the postman. Hypo-Litus desired him to retire, and being overjoyed at seeing the direction wrote in his friend lord Sussex's hand, he opened it with precipitation and found those words.

THATEVER resolutions I might have formed to write to you no more, " I cannot but think that a filence of three " months is long enough to let you fee how much . "I am incensed at your infidelity to the lovely " Julia; and though your being married to " fuch great advantage ought to rejoyce all your " friends, and I more than any other, yet I must " own to you that I cannot share in your joy, and " could wish you never had loved Julia, or " that you had continued faithful to her. She " was ready to expire with grief when the ambaf-" fador of Florence presented your letters to lord " Douglas, but more fo when she beheld the picture of your new mistress, the consequence of " which

d

13

d

h

1

" which were like to have proved fatal to her; " and she has taken a step out of revenge that I " fear she will ever repent of. Though I suppose " you have no longer an esteem for her, yet if you " have any remains of the humanity for which " you were formerly fo remarkable, you cannot " but be greatly affected at hearing of her being " married to the earl of BEDFORD; a facrifice that " has cost her so many tears, that her wedding, " had more the appearance of a pompous funeral " than that of a joyful festival. She is at present " with her lord at his feat in Berkshire, the amiable " LUCILLA-keeps her company in her folitude, " and while you are enjoying a thousand pleasures, " fhe is overwhelmed with the most piercing grief. " Do not be offended that I did not write fooner, " and I ought also to apologize for the coolness " of this letter to my dear Hypolitus, but I " could not overcome my anger at your infidelity " to Julia, and there was an absolute necessity " for my writing thus without referve, to convince " you how much I am your fincere friend,

SUSSEX.

Hyporitus was greatly furprized at the beginning of this letter, nor could be comprehend its O 2 meaning.

meaning. His marriage! his inconftancy! and the reproaches of his friend, all appeared to him like a chimera; but when he came to that part where his friend acquainted him with JULIA's being married to the earl of BEDFORD, he seemed like one thunderstruck, and fell down at the foot of a tree; a thousand times he thought of ending at once his life and mifery, by falling on his fword, but a feeble ray of hope still prevented him; " It " is eafy to fee the trick they are playing me, per-" haps Julia is not quite fatisfied of my constan-" cy, and may have defired lord Sussex to write " in this manner, both to alarm and recall my " love, supposing I had been false." But those thoughts foon gave place to others more afflicting: " How," cried he, " is she married! and do I " know this and yet live! Ah Julia, adorable " Julia! what crime have I committed? why " do you suspect my heart capable of such black " ingratitude? this heart which you have for ever " made your own by your goodness, was it possible " that it should love another? ah! doubtless, you " yourself are false, else you would not have so " easily believed all those idle reports." He was filent for fome moments, and repenting of having " accused accused his mistress, asked her pardon as if she had been present, accompanied with a torrent of tears and fuch mournful complaints as would be difficult to express, frequently interrupting himself with the most terrible denunciations of vengeance against the ravisher of his mistress, and against those who had affisted in playing so foul a trick. In this sad condition he never reflected how the hours passed, and though the night was very far advanced, he never once so much as thought of leaving the wood, but walked from place to place like one distracted, sometimes leaning against a tree, or stretched on the ground, finding every change of fituation equally uneafy. The violent agitation of his mind, his despair and anger, tormented him to fuch a degree that he feemed rather dead than alive.

Signior Leander with whom he was to pass
the evening, was very uneasy at his long absence;
and having enquired where he might be found,
was told by the gentleman who had brought HyPOLITUS his letters, that he had lest him in the wood; though this was the season for passing the evenings in such an agreeable place, and what was very common in Italy, yet he was in pain for his fafety, least some accident might have happened to him; this faithful friend went immediately to feek him, and having heard his voice at a distance advanced towards the place from whence it came, where he faw him by the light of the moon ftretched on the ground like one dead, " Ah! my dear "Hypolitus," cried he, " doubtless you have " been attacked by thieves and perhaps are dan-" gerously wounded," " How happy should I be," replied Hypolitus, in a melancholy tone, " if I was either dangeroully wounded, or dead; " but my dear LEANDER, my misfortunes are of " a more dreadful kind, and they are now become " insupportable. I have loft my all !--- Just " heaven, I have loft my all!-" He could utter no more, and as lord Sussex's letter lap near him, LEANDER doubted not but it was the cause of his grief, and not receiving an answer to any of his questions, he took it up and went to fome distance where the moon shone very bright, that he might if possible read it; but how great was he furprized and fhocked at learning the cause of his friend's affiction, and returned immediately to the place where he left him, that he might if possible give him some consolation. He was greatly furprized at not finding him, HYPOLITUS having having quitted the place, walked as fast as possible without knowing what he did. LEANDER was greatly troubled and called him feveral times to no purpose; but at last he heard him at some distance speaking to himself, and hastening towards him, he caught him by the arm, and having embraced him, with marks of the most tender friendship, said what reason and the great regard he had for him could dictate; he entered into the fubject of his grief and would not oppose it till after the first emotion was passed, then by degrees he endeavoured to alleviate it, by flattering him with hopes, telling him that great and generous fouls like his, ought not to fuffer themselves to be thus overwhelmed with affliction, conjuring him by all that was dear to him to endeavour to overcome his forrows, least what was only the effects of his passion and extreme grief, should be deemed a want of fortitude in him. He was no ftranger to the pride of his friend, therefore it was touching him in the tenderest part, and where he could not possibly resist, adding that since his mistress had fhewn fuch a diflike to her marriage, it was a fure fign that he had yet a place in her heart, and that . his case was not so desperate as he imagined, since he was yet beloved; all these arguments made Hyrollius at least give a truce to his sighs, and endeavour to relieve himself by complaints which in some degree give consolation to the unfortunate.

DAY began to appear, when LEANDER with much difficulty prevailed on HYPOLITUS to to accompany him to his house, where as soon as they arrived, LEANDER caused him to be put to bed, and would not quit him while there was the least necessity for his attendance; it is difficult to imagine how much this satal stroke had, in a sew hours altered the disconsolate HYPOLITUS, who was scarce to be known.

How dangerous therefore is love, and in the beginning of a tender engagement how difficult to be known? How pleasing and delightful it is! the venom glides insensibly into the heart, all our senses conspire against us and are properly speaking our affassins.

SEVERAL days passed before HYPOLITUS came to a fixed resolution, but at last he determined to return to London, nor was the fear of his father's displeasure, or the agreement with lady BEDFORD; that he should not return to England till three years were elapsed, capable of changing his intention, and he even thought it beneath him to waste a moment in reflection on what appeared to him of fo triffing a nature; and when fignior LEANDER mentioned it to him, " Ah the traitors !" cried he, " they only fent me at a distance that they might " with the greater ease accomplish their cruel de-" figns. What more therefore have I now to " dread? nor is there any danger that I would " not brave without the least fear. My misfor-" tunes are at the highest, and in my deplorable " ftate all I have to dread is to live too long." LEANDER finding him determined in his resolutions, resolved not to leave him, and as Hypoli-TUS in his present weak fituation, was not capable of ordering his affairs, this generous friend took care of every thing with the fame goodness that one friend would wish to meet with from another in a like fituation. He told him they must make a pretence to vifit Rome, and take each a fervant in whose fidelity they could confide, and LE-ANDER having afked permission of the fenator his father to go to Rome with Hypotrus, he obtained it without difficulty.

THEY fet out together and went as far as Bologna, where they only staid to pay a visit to count count BENTIVOGLIO, friend to the senator AL-BERTI, to whom they were ftrongly recommended, and after croffing the Apenine mountains they, passed through Fierosola, and went by the mountains to Leghorn; but as there was no vessel. there ready to fail for England, they hired a Tartane, went by fea to Marseilles, and two days. after they embarked from thence for England. HYPOLITUS before to departure had the pleafure of receiving letters from the Earl of WAR-WICK, with whom he had always very punctually corresponded; though they had but few opportunities of writing to each other; the Earl as he defigned went to Venice with a view to offer his fervice to that republick, but the Venetians enjoyeda profound peace, and this great city contented itfelf with being an idle spectator of the troubles of Europe. About this time Cosmo DE MEDICIS supported by the emperor, belieged Sienna, and bravely took that city, by which means Tuscany, Piedmont, and France enjoyed not the least repose, and it was then also that the republic of Venice was revenged on the infults it had received from MUSTAPHA BIFO: this famous corfair having entered the Adriatick Sea with feveral armed veffels, plundered and laid wafte the coast of Dalmatia;

Dalmatia; but general CANALIS foon followed and came up with him, and having funk all his veffels, took him prisoner, and caused his head to be struck off on the deck of his galley. After this expedition, the Venetians thought only of preferving peace with all the neighbouring powers. and the earl of WARWICK who wanted only to fignalize himfelf, feeing there was no prospect of an opportunity in the tranquillity which then reigned, heard with pleasure of the preparations that were making at Malta, to refift the attacks of DRAGUT RAIS, who had put to fea, by the emperor's orders with fifty gallies. The knights of Malta apprehensive of this armament, thought it highly necessary to put themselves in a posture of defence against this corfair, and even attack him if necessary. The earl of WARWICK who had not yet forgot the torments he had fuffered during his captivity with DRAGUT, was rejoiced at the thoughts of fighting in the fervice of religion, as well as being revenged on his enemy. He therefore requested ALOGO MOCINICO, doge of Venice, to recommend him to the grand mafter of Malta, which he immediately complied with, on account of the great fervices which the earl had done the republic. He therefore departed for Malta, where he was extremely well received, and embarked with the commander of the Va-LETTA. They performed together all that could be expected from the prudence and valour of two fuch great men; and having finished their expedition, returned to Malta. Soon after his lordship set out once more for Venice, from whence he wrote to Hypolitus, who had already fent him an account of the dreadful news he had received of Julia's being married. The earl was greatly incenfed at this news, and in his answer, told Hypolitus, that he would only flay to fettle some affairs of the greatest consequence, which would detain him for fome time at Venice, but the moment they were finished he would set out for London, and take his daughter out of the earl of Bedford's possession, as the marriage could not be lawful without his confent, affuring him that he only should possess Julia. This hope was fo agreeable to the desponding HYPOLITUS. that his forrows for a time feemed fuspended, and fignior LEANDER did not omit to persuade him that as JULIA's father was yet living, and was a man of great merit and quality, she would without doubt be given up to him as foon as he should think proper to demand her, THE

THE two illustrious travellers arrived at London incognito, but so great was the aversion of Hypolitus to his father's house, that he even shunned the street in which it was, and went immediately to the earl of Sussex's who at first received him with great coolness, till fignior LEAN-DER observing that HYPOLITUS by his looks feemed re'apfing into his former grief, he broke filence, and acquainted lord Sussex with every circumstance relating to Hypolitus; and also of the happy meeting of the earl of WARWICK and him at fea, and other particulars which he had learnt from Hypolitus. The earl of Sussex overcome with grief at this fad relation, fell on HYPOLITUS's neck, and having clotely embraced him, shed a torrent of tears; " ah ! my dear and " faithful friend," faid he, " what is this I hear? " how! is it possible that you were not married in " Italy? And yet this false report was the sole " occasion of the loss of your mittress" At these words Hypolitus recovering as from a dream, and fighing profoundly, "where is she?" faid he interrupting him, " where is the whom I yet adore " notwihstanding all the torments her too precipi-" tate anger has caused me." " She is yet at Berkshire,"

"Berkshire," replied lord Sussex, "and the fair " LUCILLA is with her, this generous maid does " all in her power to alleviate the forrows of her " friend by sharing them with her; and I am " informed that she has been dangerously ill, that " her lord is furiously jealous of her, and a few " days ago being at a great hunting party to which " lord NEVIL had invited many of his friends (as " you know he has a fine feat near that of the earl " of BEDFORD) to pass some days with him, " it gave me great pleasure, as I was in hopes " by this means to get an opportunity of feeing " Julia, as I thought that being in the neighbour-" hood, I might visit her without any suspicion of " defign. The earl of BEDFORD was of the par-" ty, and I acquainted him with my intention to " visit him, he replied with a cold civility, " that I should do him a pleasure, but that he " was very feldom at home, you have a lady " added I who knows perfectly well how to do " the honours of the house in your absence. He " blushed at these words, and seemed a little dis-" concerted, but foon recovering from his confu-" fion, that lady faid he loves folitude and is fre-" quently indifposed; these answers which were well calculated to discourage me had not the " defired

" defired effect, and being resolved to risk a deni" al I went a few days after to his seat, but his
" orders were so well obeyed, that I found it im" possible to see her or speak with Lucilla.
" Alas!" cried Hypolitus, " how can I expect " to see her, I that wounded her husband who no
" doubt hates me more than ever." "Unless you
" could disguise yourself," replied lord Sussex,
" you will find it impossible to succeed."

" I HAVE thought of a plan," continued lord Sussex, " which I believe will please you, that " is to disguise yourselves like travelling pedlars, and being furnished in their manner with toys " of all kinds, you may eafily gain admittance at " lord BEDFORD's, and perhaps fee JULIA her-" felf, and this without the least fuspicion." They liked the expedient admirably well, and Hypo-LITUS requested his lordship would give orders immediately for every thing necessary for their new occupation, which was foon got ready; in order to disguise themselves the more, they provided large wiggs to conceal their hair. Signior LE-ANDER needed only to difguife the air of nobility and grandeur, for which he was very remarkable, but Hyzolitus was obliged to take greater care: to prevent his being known to the earl of BED-FORD, for which reason he put a la ge patch of black filk on one eye that concealed part of his face. Every thing being thus prepared, they fet out at night in their usual dress, accompanied by their fervants, who carried the necessaries for the disguise. A thousand sensations of joy and grief, hope and despair, occupied the mind of Hypoli-TUS during their journey. " My dear LEAN-" DER," faid he, " in what disposition shall I find " my dear Julia, will she pity me? will she heark-" en to my complaints? ah! how my heart is torn " with inquietude and anger! how shall I bear to " fee her; or if her lord is present will it be in " my power to forbear taking vengeance on the " fpot for the innumerable torments he has caused " me." In this manner did those dear friends converse during their journey; being arrived, they dismounted in a wood at some distance from the house, and undressing themselves put on their disguifes, being provided with a case of pocket pistols each, went boldly towards the house, leaving their fervants and horses in the wood.

THOUGH lord BEDFORD'S castle was entirely furrounded by the wood, yet as HYPOLITUS had been there several times, they had no difficulty in finding finding it. Signior LEANDER took on himself the office of speaking, and answering whatever questions should be affeed them. The first person they met with on entering the outer court of the cafile was the earl of BEDFORD himself, this fatal fight made Hypothrus tremble with rage, and he had great difficulty in keeping himfelf within. bounds. LEANDER accosted him in Italian which the earl understood perfectly well, and acquainted him that they had a great quantity of jewels, and other toys, if he would chuse to see them. He conducted them into a large hall, and having viewed their trinkets liked them fo well that he fent a a page to request the company of his lady and LUCILLA, and in a few moments they both came. JULIA being supported by LUCILLA, was very. pale, her eyes languishing, and she seemed to be overwhelmed with a profound melancholy, but notwithstanding her grief, she appeared so lovely. that HYPOLITUS could scarce support himself, but by leaning against the wall.

THE servants brought a couch for JULIA, who regarded in a careless manner the jewels and trinkets which LEANDER presented to her view, without any desire of being a purchaser, except a painting painting in miniature, which represented a fick cupid, near whom stood reason presenting him with a bowl of cordial, but Cupid seemed to repulse him, and on a scrole was written

NOTHING CAN CURE ME.

She could not forbear making LUCILLA take notice of this picture, looking on her at the same time with fuch piercing eyes that HYPOLITUS who watched all her motions was touched to the very foul; and finding that lord BEDFORD was amused by LEANDER, searing JULIA would retire, he ventured to open his box, and having taken out the bracelet which she had given him when he fet out for Italy, he presented it to her, and without disguising his voice, which his emotion had fufficiently changed, " Observe this bracelet, ma-" dam," faid he, " perhaps your ladyship never " faw one so elegant, or so well made." She took it up in a negligent manner, but viewing it with attention, she appeared so surprized that if his lordship had observed her at that instant, he would have had cause for suspicion. Julia having examined the hair, and the hearts, with the device, "Where had you this bracelet?" faid she in a low voice, that none but he might hear her. LEAN-DER feeing his friend engaged with his miffres kept kept the earl in discourse, that he might not obferve them, and Hypolitus being a little at liberty, " You desire to know, madam," said he, " where I bought it; fuch a jewel as this is not " to be purchased. In a certain period of my life, " I adored a lovely creature in whom was center-" ed all my hopes of happiness, and by whom I " was beloved in return; but that time is passed, " my dear Julia," continued he, approaching nearer as if to make her remark the workmanship of the bracelet, " that too happy time is fled for " ever !- She believed me false, and I am come " to throw myfelf at her feet, and to affure her of " my innocence;" at this moving speech Julia could not but know her dear Hypolitus: she fighed profoundly, and leaning her head on her hand, shed a torrent of tears, which it was not in her power to restrain. " The misfortunes of this " lady would be insupportable," said she, " if it " is true that you never were false to her." While they were thus discoursing, LEANDER had shewn the earl of BEDFORD a most curious telescope, telling his lordship the best way to make tryal of its exactness would be to go on the terrals which was near the hall; thus Hypolitus having no other witness but his dear fifter, could no longer withold withold himself from falling at her feet, and taking one of her lovely hands kiffed it with inexpressible rapture. Lucilla was overjoyed at her brother's return, and Julia was fo overcome with transport, fear, and grief, that she could not pronounce a word, nor did she dare come to an explanation. " No my adorable Julia," continued Hypoli-TUS, looking on her with ineffable tenderness, " No, I am not false, and you have been imposed " upon by traitors who made you believe I was " married (which I never once thought of) on " purpose to embitter the remainder of my wretched life. I am faithful, but you my JULIA are: " inconstant!" " Dearest Hypolitus," replied The, in a voice interrupted with fobs, " you are " now amply revenged, and I am severely punished for having been so unsortunate as to fall into-" the fnare that was laid for me." Though my love and respect prevents me from reproaching " you," replied he, " I cannot forbear telling you, " that you were fo precipitate, one would ima-" gine you had other reasons besides that of aner ger, else you might have consulted the earl of " WARWICK your father, and waited for his " confent ?" While he spoke thus Julia looked on him with eyes full of compassion, being now perfuaded perfuaded that his great troubles had at last deprived him of his fenses. "What is it you tell " me concerning my father ?" cried she, " I do " not remember ever to have feen him. Alas if. " he had not been killed, I should not be in my " present wretched situation." Hypolitus was by this speech convinced that his father had suppressed all his and the earl of WARWICK's letters. which caused his anger to breakforth anew. " You " are to know then my dear Julia," faid he, (after he had risen for fear of being surprized in the posture he was in) " that though fortune was so " much my enemy it made me fome amends in " the meeting with your illustrious father at fea: " He was a flave to DRAGUT RAIS, the pirate " against whom he fought, when the report of his " death reached England; I had the happiness to " deliver him from his captivity, and he wrote to " you-" Just as he pronounced these words the earl of BEDFORD returned, disputing with LEANDER concerning the price of the telescope : and LEANDER whose fole aim was to detain his lordship, differed with him above a quarter of an hour on its value, but was at last obliged to fell it for fear of making him angry. While they were all together in the hall, the counters of NEVILL arrived :

arrived; she was aunt to JULIA, but without her knowledge, because she was ignorant of lady Ben-FORD's being the earl of WARWICE's daughter. though her love for her was the fame as if she was acquainted with the kindred; they were neighbours in the country, and fhe came to defire her company to her daughter's wedding, who was to be married to lord Howard, a nobleman descended from one of the most illustrious families in the kingdom, " and though there will not be much-" company," faid she to JULIA, " yet we shall " not be at a loss for amusement," I must confess, " madam; replied Junia, " that the pleasure of " feeing your agreeable family would of itself be " a fufficient inducement, but as I am only just " beginning to recover from a tedious illness, and am yet so feeble that I fear my presence would " only ferve to incomode fuch a joyful festival." "Your ladyship may make what excuses you " please," replied the countess, " but I must as-" fure you that the wedding shall not be solem-" nized unless you are present; there will be no. " p'easure without your company, and I am re-" folved to take you with me this moment." Lord Howard being a near relation to the earlof BEDFORD, he joined his request to that of lady.

lady Nevill's, and Julia not daring to refuse any longer, departed immediately with her ladyship, without her or Lucilla's having an opportunity of learning from Hypolitus where he had left the earl of Warwick; and they had only time to order the pedlars to call on them again, as they wanted some trinkets; so the lovers took leave of each other only with their eyes and departed.

LEANDER and HYPOLITUS also quitted the caftle, and walked for some time without speaking, fo much were they occupied with their thoughts, which had thrown them into a profound meditation : at last LEANDER breaking silence," you have " this day" faid he " brought me acquainted with " two of the most lovely women in the world, and " I think it is impossible to see them without ad-" miration. I regarded JULIA as the object of 46 your love, but Lucitla, the charming Lucit-" LA is become the object of mine; and if you " were not her brother," continued he, " I should " dread your being my rival. She has quite " charmed me, her engaging manners, her spright-" ly air, the regularity of her features, and deli-" cate shape, all those advantages which she has above all her fex has fo transported me, that I must

" must confess I never felt for another what I " now do for her." HYPOLITUS was fo overioved at hearing his friend speak in this manner, that stopping all of a sudden, and embracing him, " you " had but one fault my dear friend," faid he, " which was that of infenfibility, and I sometimes " regretted my being in love when in your compa-" ny, or else wished that you had been so, as I " imagined my complaints were tirefome; and " that you were not capable of being touched " with my griefs, as you could not possibly judge " of the greatness of my torments, having never " endured the like yourself; I am now rejoiced " that you have found an object capable of enas gaging your affections, and it shall not be my " fault if my fifter does not inspire you with a vio-" lent and lasting slame. But what do you think of " the amiable JULIA? have I not reason to adore " her, did you ever see a beauty equal to her? " I was quite dazzled with it, the langour and " fadness which appeared in all her actions, makes " her look more charming than ever, and renders " me the most unfortunite of men. Alas! too " well I am fensible of the loss I have suffained

While they thus continued their conversation they came to the place where their servants waited for them, and having quickly thrown off their disguises were putting on their usual dress, when they heard a prodigious noise of men and horses : and foon after feeing themselves surrounded on all fides, they were extreamly furprifed, not doubting but it was themselves whom these people were feeking, when they perceived some with drawn fwords, and others with fire-arms, commanding them to furrender, but though the odds were fo much against the young heroes that it was the greatest temerity to attempt making any resistance; yet nevertheless they put themselves in a posture of defence, then firing their piftols wounded each his man; and placing their backs against some large trees to prevent being furprised behind, they determined to defend themselves to the last extremity, being bravely seconded by their servants; but as the affailants were continually encreasing, and their strength beginning to fail, besides as they aimed not at their lives because they called to them without intermission to furrender, they were at last obliged to comply, being fo weak as to be scarce able to fland, but when those wretches had them in their power they used them with great cruelty being enraged at the wounds which fome of their companions had received in the fight,

Q

THEY

THEY were conducted in this manner to the house of a justice of peace which was not far off, and from whom they had received orders to arrest them; the reason of which was that when LEAN-DER and HYPOLITUS came to the wood, some peasants who happened to pass near the spot where they disguised themselves, seeing them take off their cloaths which were richly embroider'd, to put on others fo very different, and observing that one of them covered his eye with a black patch, they doubted not but these belonged to the gang of thieves who had lately committed many roberies in these parts, and having related what they had feen to the justice, he immediately fent out a party as fecretly as possible, who arriving at the wood just when they were taking off their difguifes, it conwinced them of their being robbers, on which they began the attack without asking any questions.

HYPOLITUS during their journey was tortured with a variety of reflections on the oddity of this adventure, nor could be conceive whence this milfortune proceeded; "is it," faid he," the confequence of my father's anger, or have I been feel by any person who may have discovered my being

" being in England to the counters of Bedford,
" who with her son, have taken advantage of their
" agreement with my father?" He could suspect no other person; but he was surprised that they should seize Leander, and he lamented his being the occasion of his friend's ill treatment. When they arrived at the justice's, he examined them apart and they were not a little surprised at being asked if it was not they that had committed such and such murders and robberies, and on their denying it, instead of being set at liberty, they were put into a deep dungeon, loaded with chains, and strictly guarded.

END OF THE FIRST PART.

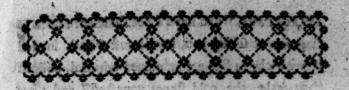

0 2

THE

The interest of the consecution
THE TENT PAT IS ONE

Control of the Contro

astrust

n mant talkets

THE

HISTORY

to no arable comiculty philipical act decing 3.

HYPOLITUS,

" ale testly formit and I'd no effice you

Pures a coloration of the bridge

EARL of DOUGLAS.

PART THE SECOND DESCRIPTION OF CHARLES

B POBITUS and LEANDER faid all that the ftrongest friendship could dictate.

"Do not disquiet yourself my dear

- friend faid LEANDER, you fee that this is cau
 - discover yourself, and they will foon fet us at
- What my dear LEANDER," cried
 Q 3 HYPOLITUS

HYPOLITUS, "and have I not fufficient reason to " greive at feeing you, my dearest friend, loaded " with chains like a condemned criminal, obliged " to make the cold flones your bed; and after " having given me a thousand proofs of friendship " in your own country, you accompany me to " mine, and the first place you are conducted to, " is a loathfome prison; thus are you recom-" penced for the civilities you have shewn me! " and yet you would have me be infenfible?" "I " would," interrupted LEANDER, " because when " I share your griefs, my dear friend, my own " are partly forgot; and I dare affure you, " that I look on all that has happened as trifles " not to be regarded, and if you were well ac-" quainted with my fentiments, this adventure " need give you no manner of uneafiness." " I " should be unworthy your friendship, my dear " LEANDER," faid HYPOLITUS, " if it were " possible for me ever to forget it; but only con-" fider, my dear friend, what may be the confe-" quence if I am obliged to discover myself, and " if the earl of BEDFORD should come to know " it, together with the circumstances of my dif-" guife, what will he not have reason to think. As "Wind no dear Leave he is jealous and passionate, he will perhaps ac-" cuse Julia as being concerned in it, nor will " her virtue and innocence preserve her from his " fuspicions, and perhaps I may be the occasion " of her losing her repose; add to this, that if it " should come to be known by my father, there " is no violence which he is not capable of, and " perhaps he would take me from my present " confinement only to put me in a worfe, which " he has often threatened; and the consequence " will be that JULIA will appear guilty in the " eyes of her lord, and be for ever loft to me." "Those are indeed cruel extremities," faid LE-ANDER with an air of fadness, " and yet I fee " no other method of our being released." " I " have a thought," faid HYPOLITUS, " which " perhaps may fucceed: it frequently happens " that some of these justices are very covetous, " perhaps this man is one of thefe, and I will " make trial, by offering him a large fum for our " discharge." LEANDER approved very much of this scheme, and in this manner did they pass the rest of the night.

AT noon the next day they were brought before his worship, who instead of proceeding with their examinations examinations as they imagined, asked them if they had courage to fight. They could not comprehend the meaning of this question, and HYPOLI-Tus told him he should have asked that of those he fent to take them prisoners. But drawing near his worship, and speaking very low, " If you will " fet us at liberty, you need only demand what " recompence you please, and you may be affured " of receiving it." I am not to be bribed," replied the justice, " and besides there are so many con-" cerned in this affair, that some of them must be " made examples of." HYPOLITUS in despair at finding his offer thus rejected, refolved to discover himself. "The offer I have made you," continued he, " for letting us depart, cannot prejudice you " in the least, and to convince you will disclose " who I am, and I here make you the same offers " to keep it fecret, as I have fome very particu-" lar reasons not to be known at present: My " name is Hypolitus, and I am fon to the earl of Douglas, but detain me until I have made " you a sufficient present." "You are very bold," faid his worship, " in daring to assume that name " before me, as I well know that he whose name " you have taken is now in Italy." Having spoke thus,

tfe

11

11

t

b

thus, he gave orders to his people to get ready to depart with the prisoners, himself leading the van. HYPOLITUS and LEANDER being placed in the center, as they were descending a hill, they saw at a diffance a most magnificent house, surrounded with fine gardens and parks planted with large trees, which formed an agreeable shade, under which appeared a concourfe of people, and the found of feveral kinds of instruments was heard on all fides. "What can all this mean, my dear Hy-" POLITUS," faid LEANDER, " are we going to " this fine house where all the pleasures seem to " be united, what kind of figure shall we make at " this festival?" Hypolitus looking on his friend with an air of sadness replied, " it is only at a di-" flance that we shall partake of the festival you " mean, and I believe that they are conducting " us to some town which is in the neighbourhood " of this house, or perhaps to London,"

As they were thus discoursing, they perceived a person coming towards them, who seemed by his air and the number of his attendants to be a man of quality. Leander asked his friend if he knew him, "No," said he, "but I believe he is one of "the noblemen that lives in this county;" as he drew drew near, the justice saluted him with great respect, " My lord," faid his worship, " I was just " going to acquaint your lordship with my great " disappointment, our two gladiators have broke " their promise, though they were to have been " with me yesterday." His lordship was very angry, and told him if he had not depended on him for their coming, he would have provided others. "There is a great deal of company at my house," continued his lordship, " and I have promised " them this amusement." " As these have disap-" pointed me," replied the justice, " I have four " thieves, whom I took last night in the forest, " and I can affure your lordship they defended " themselves extremely well, and I believe will " give your company great diversion." The nobleman having cast his eyes on the prisoners, admired in particular the good mien of Hypoli-TUS and LEANDER. " I thank you," faid he in a milder tone, " and I believe those two young. " men are very fit persons for our use; therefore " make hafte and I shall order every thing to be " prepared." He immediately dispatched two of his fervants before him; and the justice caused his troop to advance with greater speed.

LEANDER

LEANDER was not enough acquainted with the English language to understand all that had been faid, but Hyrotarus fighing profoundly, "ah my " dear LEANDER," faid he, " how will all this end? " gracious heaven to what are we yet referved? "They dessign to make us fight against each " other." " Explain this to me," faid LEANDER, " for as yet I am entirely in the dark." " You " cannot be ignorant," faid HYPOLITUS " that " the Romans frequently entertained their com-" pany with shows, and sometimes criminals were " made to fight against each other; and having " introduced this custom into England when they conquered it, it has remained ever fince, but " with this difference, that the gladiators of the " present time are people devoted to that trade; " I say devoted, because they frequently die of " their wounds, and I call a trade what people do to get money. They are cloathed in linen, " wear pumps, and on their heads a small cap, " in this dress they appear on the stage armed " with broad-fwords without points, as they only " use the edge, and make an agreement with the spectators not to quit the stage till they have " drawn blood three times, wounding each other irangiani

"most desparately, never sparing their antagonist while they remain on the stage, though they are comrades and equally divide their gains; they also sight with long pikes which have very sharp points putting out each others eyes; in fine it is a most horrid sight, and those who delight in such kind of sports are not less barbarous, though much more to blame than they. This my friend is the use for which we are reserved." "Who I, my dear Hypolitus, I sight against you and wound you in this cruel manner," cried Lean-

JUST as LEANDER ended these words, they arrived at this magnificent house, into which they were conducted and placed in the great hall; victuals were brought them but they would not eat, which being told to the justice he came and acquainted them that they must prepare for the combat with a good grace, as their lives were at his disposal, swearing most vehemently if they did not comply, he would hang them on the trees before the court. They requested with great earnestness to speak with the lord of the house, but the justice observing there was a great friendship between Hypolitus and Leander, imagined

ift

re

ey

rp

is

h

d

imagined he defired to obtain leave, that they might not fight against each other, and would not suffer any person to speak with them. Nothing could equal their despair, the hour for their appearance was now passed, and the more obstinate they were in refusing to sight, the more they were threatened with a shameful death. At last they consulted together, resolving that when they were armed, instead of using them against each other, they would employ them in selling their lives as dear as possible; being thus exasperated with anger and sury, they put on the habits which were brought them, and seemed as if they were determined to obey.

THE company were affembled in a large court, where a stage was erected for the gladiators, who soon made their appearance; and when they entered the court, a confused murmur burst from the company, each person viewing them with admiration; their youth, beauty, and good mein, interested all who saw them in their favour. Signior Leander was quite unknown to them, but several took notice of the great resemblance there was between one of the robbers, (for such they believed Hypolitus to be,) and the son of lord

R

DOUGLAS

Douglas; "if he was not in Italy," faid they, "one would imagine that it was himself." These two faithful friends viewed the company with a fierce and noble countenance, and then cast their eyes on the miserable wretches whom they were to fight: these were thirty constables whom the justice had fixed round the stage, bravely placing himself at their head, because he imagined there was no danger.

HYPOLITUS and LEANDER then closely embraced each other, firmly believing, and not without reason, that they were going to devote themfelves to certain destruction, but their courage was too great to fuffer them to shew the least fear : and Hypolitus, had some consolation in the thoughts of not being known, and that his having difguifed himself in order to seek Julia would remain for ever a fecret. According to their agreement, they in an instant leaped from the stage, and running to the justice and constables snatched from them their fwords, which were better than their own, and attacked them with fury, being themselves quite covered with blood, having received several desparate wounds. At this instant JULIA and LUCILLA who had refused to be prefent fent at the combat, which was not agreeable to their gentle dispositions, hearing an unusual disturbance, together with the shrieks of several ladies who were moved with fear and compassion, went on the terrass where the company had placed themselves, in the front of which was the great marble staircase which led to the place of combat, and casting their eyes not without horror on the gladiators, whom at first they could scarce distinguish in the confufion, but alas, they foon discovered them to be their dear Hypoterus and his generous friend; what a cruel fight was this! it is impossible to describe their surprise, terror, and affliction. "Just "heaven! it is Hypolitus, it is he himself," cried they, decending the staircase at the same time with fuch precipitation that they seemed rather to fly than walk, and ran towards them like persons who thought no loss equal to that of losing what one loves. This action furprized the whole affembly, and they were followed by the greatest part of the gentlemen fword in hand; and having placed themfelves near their lovers, who found their strength redoubled at fight of their mistresses, and being feconded by the gentlemen, the constables were obliged to give way, and the two friends remained mafters of the field of battle; but growing weak with R 2 with the loss of blood, HYPOLITUS fainted at JULIA'S feet, and LEANDER going to affift him, fell motionless near his friend, both clad in gore.

JULIA and LUCILLA were no longer able to contain their grief at this dreadful fight; the former whose thoughts were entirely taken up with her dear lover, placed his head in her lap, tenderly embracing him, and wetting his face with her tears, uttered the most bitter complaints, and endeavoured with her handkerchief to stop the blood which flowed from his wounds; leaving the care of LEANDER to LUCILLA, who felt a secret liking for this illustrious stranger, which was excited by tenderer motives than those of mere generosity, They were going to convey Hypolitus to an apartment to dress his wounds, when recovering he looked on Julia with a languishing air, and forgetting before whom he spoke, " Permit'me, my " dear Julia," faid he, with great emotion, " to " expire in your arms; my death then will be more " tranquil than my life has been." Very few heard what he faid, and those that did, imagined it to be a wandering of the senses, which sometimes denotes a speedy death; but the earl of BEDFORD who unfortunately happened to be present was quite t

0

h

-

75

1-

d

81

-

d ın

le

ry

to

re

rd

to

e-

D

13

re

futer to HYPOLITUS; that they were brought up together, and that it was HYPOLITUS who wounded him in the garden at Buckingham, when he attempted to carry her off. He faw in a moment what he had to fear, as his suspicions seemed now realised; but when he was informed by the justice that these gentlemen had been taken disguised like pedlars, he had the curiosity to examine the contents of their boxes, which at once convinced him that JULIA and HYPOLITUS had long loved each other, but he artfully concealed this discovery.

The two friends being conveyed to the same apartment, the first dressing was applied to their wounds which were more deep than dangerous; and now Julia began to resect that her lord would be displeased at the extream tendernes; she had shewn for Hypolitus, and to repair in some measure her fault, she requested Lucilla to acquaint her brother, that to save appearances she must not visit him but in the presence of her lord, from which he might easily imagine the violence it would be to her inclinations, as she had not as yet been able to erase from her heart those tender

R 3

fentiments

fentiments with which he had inspired her, conjuring him at the same time to let her know where he had left her father.

MEAN while lord NEVIL was inconfolable on account of the adventure which had happened at his house, as he had a great esteem for the earl of Douglas, and confequently the same for his son, and being also informed of LEANDER'S quality, he did all in his power to convince them of his forrow for what had passed. Hypolitus to whom he spoke, requested his lordship not to acquaint his father with this adventure, and frankly owned that love was the cause of his return from Italy : as also of his being thus disguised. His lordship promifed to comply with his request, some of the company endeavoured to discover the reasons which obliged those two gentlemen to disguise themselves; they imagined it was on account of some love affair but could not discover with whom, and as they thought Julia was fifter to Hypolitus. they never once suspected it was on her account. and each formed conjectures according to their different ideas. The poor justice alone dreaded the consequences of this adventure, and was greatly alarmed when he was informed of their quality; he therefore entreated Julia and Lucilla to intercede for his pardon which was generously granted him.

As LUCILLA went frequently to her brother's apartment because Julia desired to hear from him every moment, he called to her and faid, " Ah my " dear fifter, will you always come alone, and will " not the amiable TULIA come to alleviate my griefs?" " If she had only her own inclinations " to follow," replied LUCILLA, " you would have " feen her oftener than me, but as fhe is obliged to " consult those of her lord, she dares not see you " but in his presence. She desired me to tell you this " my dear brother, and to affure you of her friend-" fhip; she also requested me to ask where you left " her father, as you had not yesterday an oppor-" tunity of fatisfying her curiofity." " Ah! my dear " fifter," cried he interrupting her, " I shall take " advantage of her curiofity, and to herfelf only " will I give an account of the earl of WARWICK : " this at least will make her come." He remained filent for some time, but resuming his discourse, " Can the refuse me a favour which I so ardently delire? I conjure you my dearest fister, to use your atmost influence in prevailing with her to " grant

"grant me this request; tell her," added he, my life depends on her answer." Lucilla promised him to do all in her power to prevail with her to come.

THE company was fo numerous at lord How-ARD's wedding, that it was thought necessary to accommodate the ladies with the best apartments. and the gentlemen with the others: JULIA and LUCILLA had one to themselves, and quitting the company earlier than usual, went immediately to bed, that they might have liberty to discourse when their women were retired, TULIA fighed and fobbed most bitterly, throwing her arms round. Lucilla's neck embracing her, faid: " Was " there ever any misfortunes equal to mine? ad-" mire with me the cruelty of my fate! fcarce have I the pleasure of feeing once more a per-" fon who is yet faithful to me notwithstanding the " reasons I have given him to hate me, scarce am " I acquainted with the joyful news of my father being yet living when it is interrupted by a thou-" fand disappointments, and am invited to a festival " where I have the misfortune of feeing my dear "Hypotitus almost affassinated; and my fensi-" hility at his fufferings disturbs my lord's repose. "I fave grant

" I saw rage in his eyes notwithstanding all the trou-" ble it has cost me to coneal my love, but I can " no longer flatter myself with his being ignorant " of it, and I am certain he is now well affured " that Hypolitus is dearer to me than life, and " that he only has possession of my heart; add to " this the cruel necessity I am under of not see-" ing him, and then imagine if " " You " must endeavour to overcome your scruples and " your fears, my dear fifter," cried Lucilla. interrupting her, " my brother's life entirely de-" pends on it, and he has defired me to conjure " you by his love, which yet remains unshaken, " not to refuse him this consolation?" " Ah! " my dear fifter," cried Julia, " he did nor re-" flect on what he asked, and if you could but " think the embarrassment it would be to me to " fee him, you would then pity, and not think of " asking me." " But my dear JULIA," said LU-CILLA, " you will get no intelligence of your fa-" ther; that father who is as I may fay rifen from " the dead, and who ought to be dear to you; " for though you are so cruel to Hypolitus, " yet you cannot be so void of curiosity in regard " to your father. My brother has affured me he " will not fpeak of him to any but yourfelf." " Alas.

cle

he 0

b

2

" Alas, my fister," replied Julia, ". do not thus: " endeavour to persuade me, my heart is in his " interest, and will I fear overcome my reason; " how difficult it is to forbear feeing a person who " is dearer to us than life itself, and how weak " is duty on these occasions. Shall I own to you, " my dear fifter, that I am disposed to follow you. " find out only the means of my doing it with fe-" crecy." Unless we go immediately," said Lu-CILLA, " we may be furprized. I ordered a " wax candle to be kept lighting, and this evening " I passed by a private stair-case which leads to " the end of the long gallery, next our apartment; " we may go that way without the least noise.-" " Would you have us go by night to his chamber," interrupted Julia, " fuppose we were discovered, " what would be the consequence? Nothing," re-" plied Lucilla, " in the eye of the world, as-" it believes us to be fifters to HYPOLITUS." "But " the earl of BEDFORD is convinced of the con-" trary," added JULIA fighing. " You are too " timorous," replied Lucilla impatiently, "come " come, my dear fifter, let us go without delay." JULIA arose, and trembling very much, put on a loofe night gown. Lucilla took her by the arm, and conducted her to her brother's chamber. Though

Though it was then very late, he had not yet closed his eyes, and seeing his dear Julia enter, he felt fuch an excess of pleasure as had like to have cost him his life; all his wounds having burst open with the violence of his emotion, and he was bathed in his blood before he perceived it. JULIA approached him, and placing herfelf near his bed, " My dear Hypolitus," faid she, letting fall fome tears, which she endeavoured to conceal, "You may now judge of the excels of my grief, " that the unfortunate Julia by changing her " condition, did not in the least alter her sentiments. Yes, my faithful Hypolitus, I will " not deny that you are dearer to me than life, " which I would with pleasure part for your repose; " you alone employ my thoughts; I pity you, " as well as myfelf, nor shall I ever find consola-" tion; but fince there is no remedy, we must en-" deavour to furmount our misfortunes by virtue, " and I am come on purpose to bid you an eternal " farewel, for though I am not mistress of my " heart, yet I am at least mistress of my conduct. \ " We must, my dear Hypolitus, we must re-" folve on the cruel necessity which my duty im-" poses, as death would be to me infinitely prefer-" able

" able to a life of shame and dishonour; and was " there no other but myfelf in the world, I would " act as if the whole earth was witness to my ac-" tions. Do not therefore think to combat my " resolutions, which would be only adding new " difficulties to those I have already fuffered." " No, my dear Julia, no," faid he, " I will " not endeavour to difuade you, and am infinitely " obliged to you for not keeping me in suspence; " nor could you have chosen a better opportunity " than this, to put a speedy end to my misfor-" tunes: the weak state to which I am reduced " by my wounds, added to what you have just " now faid, will quickly free you from the impor-" tunities of an unfortunate lover, whom you " never would have abandoned if you had truly " loved him. I will not reproach you, madam, " with having wished my death; it is what I " most ardently defire for, and my motives are " ftronger than your's." Here he was filent, and JULIA having taken notice of his being very pale, and that his eyes were half closed, his filence gave her great anxiety. She called Lucilla who was speaking to fignior LEANDER, and she having ran to her, was greatly shocked at seeing the torrent of blood which streamed from Hypolitus's bed. Having 23

d

2-

y

W

Having made LEANDER acquainted with the cause of their fright, he came immediately and bound up the wounds of his friend, though he was himfelf very weak and scarce able to stand. JULIA was inconfolable on account of the despair into which she had thrown her lover, and fitting on the fide of his bed, took his hand, on which her tears fell in great abundance, "You have not," faid she, " explained my fentiments as I wished, how-" ever if there is no medium between your feeing " me or dying, let us then continue to fee each " other, fince of all evils the loss of your life " would be the greatest, and most insupportable " to me." Hypolitus made an effort to kis her hand, but she prevented him, and thus continued her discourse: " My dear Hypolitus, " do but endeavour to conform your passion to my " duty, and I shall be content." " That is not so " difficult as you imagine, fair Julia," faid he, " you have a father, without whose permission " you have been married, nor is he in the least sa-" tisfied with the match; if you doubt it, here " is his letter on that fubject, which will convince " you." At these words he defired Lucilla to affift him in opening a letter-case, in which was this letter; he made Julia read it, and she saw he had told her truth. "He is determined," con-" tinued Hypolitus, to take you from those " unworthy hands which now possess you; and it " will be your own fault if you are not very foon " in a condition to make me happy. JULIA was greatly embarraffed at this speech, and considered with herfelf if the should speak her mind or not, imagining that as she was married, she ought to remain with her lord, as no violence had been used to force her to it. Her confusion prevented a reply, and Hypolitus perceiving how irresolute she was, " I am lost, madam," cried he, " and you have no longer any tenderness for me, " fince you hefitate in expressing the least joy at " what (if yo; were not changed) would have " caused you a great deal." " Alas !" replied she, " you are very unjust, I am not changed, " and when my father arrives, I will obey him in " every thing, provided they are not inconfiftent " either with my honour or conscience." "You er are as dear to me as life, my adorable Julia," faid he with a countenance more at ease, " do " you think me capable of wishing any thing dis-" pleasing to you? if you do, you are a stranger " to the greatness of my love." " I must in that

" do you justice," replied she, " and it is this " which has made me take fuch an uncommon " ftep. Do not any longer abuse my tenderness, "but inform me of all the circumstances relating. " to my father." He immediately complied with her request, and when he had ended his narrative, she testified her joy at his having given her new cause to love him, " To you," continued she, " am I "indebted for the liberty, and perhaps the life of " my father, nor can I without ingratitude refuse " you my acknowledgements." While they conversed in this manner, Lucilla interrupted them; by faying the day began to appear, and that it would be necessary to leave her lover and his friend at liberty to take a little repose, after the great fatigues they had undergone. Hypolitus and LEANDER reproached her with being the cause of interrupting a conversation which had given them fo much pleasure; but JULIA seeing the necessity there was for their immediate departure; conjured her lover to think of nothing but his recovery. " I wish it, my dear brother," said the, giving him her hand which he tenderly killed, " nor can you without injustice doubt my being rejoiced at it." Having made a few compli-September

S 2

ments

ments to Leanner, the retired with Luciula,

THE earl of BEDFORD did not close his eyes the whole night, being prevented by his jealous fuspicions : belides he was meditating one of the most cruel defigns that could possibly be formed against the lovers, and the better to conceal it he the next day feigned himself sick and would not rife; he complained of being feverish and proposed to return home. Julia who did not dare refift his inclinations went immediately to Hypo-LITUS's apartment, " my dear brother," faid she " I must leave you, the earl of BEDFORD is resol-" ved to return home, and I am come to affure you " once more that I will with pleasure consent to " whatever my father and you shall think proper. " I have not time for more, adjeu my dear Hypo-" LITUS, pity and love me, I leave you Lucilla " till you are recoverd." "Do you then abandon " me Julia," cried he, in a mournful voice " does " that enemy to my repose tear you from hence? ah too charming felicity, how quickly art thou " vanished! When shall I have the happiness to " fee you again, madam?" "Alas" faid the fighing, " that is more than I can tell, I am going where " I shall be strictly watched and sufficiently un-" fortunate,"

3

" fortunate," at that moment Lucitus eame to sell her that her lord waited for her. The unfortunate HypoLitus then kiffed her hand and wetting it with his tears, "adieu my adorable miftrefs," faid he almost overwhelmed with grief, " farewell ! " and be constant to your faithful lover," JULIA made no answer, --- the could not, --- but taking from her finger a fine turquoise ring, presented it to him, her eyes ftreaming with tears; " may heaven," cried Hypolitus, " foon grant the earl of Wan-" WICE to our wishes." "I long most ardently for " his presence," replied Julia in a voice scarce articulate " and you may promife yourfelf every " thing from the fituation of my heart; but above " all do not leave the least scruple to my delicacy, et let honour the world, and my virtue be entirely " fatisfied," She then quitted him and went to take leave of lady News to whose care she carnestly recommended her brother, and having fervently embraced Lucilla, they parted with fuch a piercing forrow, as if they already had a foreknowledge of the misfortunes which threstened " year cower to punit me if pully, the water

As foon as the earl of Baproad arrived at his feat, he gave fecret orders for the execution of the project which he had formed of carrying her to France, and though it was three days before they fet out, she had not the least suspicion of his delign, till he put her into the coach, and she had fcarce time to take her jewels with her. It would be impossible to express her grief, as she had every thing to fear from the rage and jealoufy of her lord. She would have wrote to Hypoth-TUS and LUCILLA, to acquaint them with her journey, as also to alleviate the affiction she was fensible they would be in on hearing of her fudden departure, but the was to closely watched by her lord that he never once fuffered her from his fight : and it was ISABELLA her woman that informed her of his lordship's intentions as far as they came to her knowledge; and notwithstanding her tears and intreaties, he obliged her to enter the carriage. " In what have I displeased you, my lord," said she . with an air of fweetpeld capable of moving the most obdurate heart, "ought not your lordship at

be you condemn med you will dever have it in " your power to punish me if guilty, though it will never be in your lordship's power to repair

the wrongs you have done me either in the eyes of

" the

" the world or in my own." "Examine your heart. " madam," faid he in an angry tone, " that will " justify me, and if I do not at present enter into " the merits of this affair, it is because this is not " a proper season to waste in idle discourse." He remained deaf to her complaints, her tears were of no effect, and without having the least opportunity of acquainting Hypotitus or Lucilla with her misfortune, she was obliged to set out for Dover, attended only by ISABELLA, and accompanied by her lord. She spoke not a word during the journey, and was wafted in a few hours from Dover to Calais, having offered many prayers to heaven that they might be overtaken with a storm, and be obliged to return to England. She remained on deck during the paffage, her head reclined on her hand, her face covered with a large veil, and her eyes turned towards England, which fhe faw with a thousand bitter pangs difappear from her fight. " I am torn, from you, my " dear HYPOLITUS," cried the to herfelf, "while " you are confiding in your good fortune, our pro-" jects are overturned, and all our hopes are va-" nished .-- Perhaps we shall never see each other more! Ah wretch that I am, I fear I may be " the

- "the cause of your death, as it is impossible you should support such a violent shock as that of my being carried off." In these resections which were enough to distract her, did she pass her time during her passage to France. She lay at Calais, and having found an opportunity when her lord
 went to give some necessary orders, she took a diamond with which she wrote the following words, on one of the windows of the room:
 - " If chance should conduct you to this place,
 - " my dear H____, and that your love
 - " fhould bring to your rememberance the hand
 - " of your unfortunate J-, receive by this,
 - " the affurance of an eternal constancy; be
 - " faithful, and if you would convince me of
 - " your love, do not affict yourself too much."

As foon as day appeared, his lordship caused her to set out for Paris, and she passed through that great and sine city without stopping, though she was very much cast down with grief, and greatly satigued with her journey. They took the road to Bourbon, his lordship having been there some years ago to drink the water. They did not go quite to the town, but stopped at a certain abber

f

h

e

abbey of nuns called St. Menoux, this abbey was between Moulins and Bourbon: Its fituation was very agreeable, but folitary; and if it was not for the company who came twice a year to drink the waters, it would have been a perfect defert. As the earl of BEDFORD was acquainted with the abbess (who was a young woman of the family of Amboise, and very conceited, though she had not a great deal of fense,) his lordship did not doubt but she would receive Julia; and asking to speak with her in private, he made an agree-The abbess afment for her board and lodging. fured him that she should be more strictly guarded than a ftate prisoner, and that she should neither fee or write to any person; this was just what he defired, and having given Julia into the abbefs's care, together with her woman, and taking leave of his spouse, told her with an air of raillery, that he hoped her dear Hypolitus would run no more risques, or subject himself by disguises to imprisonment. This ironical speech having touched her to the quick, " Do not, my lord," faid she, " feek " pretences to cloak your unworthy proceedings; " I had no share in his disguise, and in my present " misfortunes my only confolation is not having " any crime wherewith to reproach myself; you have used me with the greatest injustice; but so time will come for my justification, and have a care least it should be at your lordship's cost." He made no reply, but quitted her, well satisfied with what he had done.

JULIA remained with the abbefs, who treated her with a little less severity than she promised, though none of the nuns dared to converse with her, but those whose business it was to watch her motions. ISABELLA her woman was the only person that was permitted to attend her: She was young, well made, very discreet, and loved her mistress with the greatest affection, which made her employ all her wit to endeavour to give her lady some consolation : "Your ladyship," said she, " may expect every thing from time, and Hy-" POLITUS's love; his lordship may die, the " earl of WARWICK has power to dissolve your " marriage, and the greatest misfortunes have: " their period." "My misfortunes," faid Julia, in a languishing manner, " will not end but with " my life, fince I have not the least prospect of " escaping. I have fifty jailors when other pri-" foners have but one; and here am I confined by " the

" the caprice of my husband. The prospect of " diffolving my marriage is at a great diffance. " and I am not fatisfied with myfelf, whether I " ought in honour and conscience wish for it. " Time may perhaps change Hypolitus, and " fuppoling I was at liberty to quit the earl of " BEDFORD, and that Hypolitus proved faith-" ful, how should I find the means of leaving "this place? no person knows of my being confined " here, nor can I inform any one of my fituation " fince all the letters I have endeavoured to fend have been stopped, and thus far I have had on-".ly the vexation of having attempted it in vain." In this manner did the amiable Julia pass her days, and her nights in fighs and tears; fleep was but a very little ease to her grief, which threw her at last into such dejection of spirits, that her strength began to decay, and she was dangerously ill.

We must now leave Julia, and return to HyROLITUS, who was the last that was acquainted with what had happened his dear mistress, LuGILLA a few days after Julia's departure having sent to lord Bedford's to enquire after her health,
his lordship's servants, according to the commands
they had received, returned for answer that Ju-LIA was gone with his lordship to London, on affairs of the geatest importance. Lucilla was very uneasy at this message and surprised at not receiving a letter from her; not being able to comprehend the reason of her precipitate departure, which made her imagine there was fome dreadful mystery couched under this fudden flight, nor could she enjoy the least repose; but that she might the better endeavour to unravel it, she acquainted her brother that she had received a message from Julia, requesting her company, and that she was going in consequence of this message, but would return as foon as possible. This passionate lover charged her to fay the most tender things she could think of, and to tell her he was dying with impatience to fee her. His wounds and those of LEANDER were in a good way, and they expected to be foon entirely cuted. The expectation of foon hearing news from Julia by means of his fifter, inspired Hypolitus with an unusual joy; and it so raised his spirts that he requested his friend to give him an account of the state of his love, and what progress he had made in Lucilla's affections; "for," continued he, "I " affure you I frequently deny myself the pleasure " of talking of Julia, that you might enjoy the er multiplicato more " more of my fifter's company." " Ah, my " dear Hypolitus," cried Leander, " fhe is fo " discreetly reserved that I have not as yet been " able to discover if she has any tenderness for me, " I told her of my love with all the diffidence " which a person truly enamoured can possibly have. " but she rallies me continually, nor can I prevail " on her to consider it in a more serious light. I " was greatly charmed at first with her sprightli-" ness and vivacity, but I cannot well support it " at present, and I am tortured with apprehensions " that she has not the least regard for me." " am a better physiognomist than you," replied Hypolitus, " and as a looker on always fees " more than those who are engaged, I can affure " you that you are far from being indifferent to " her. She has spoke of you in a very expressive manner, and asked me if you had not been in " love in Italy? and when I replied you were not, is it possible, brother, faid she, that a gentle-" man of fuch merit can have no engagements? " if one may judge by his looks, he feems to " have a foul very fusceptible of love; but I faid " fmiling, it is not improbable, my dear Lucit-" LA, but you may have inspired him with ten"der sentiments, and if that is the case, will you not assist me in acquitting myself of the obliga tions I owe him." "Ah brother, replied she, do not oblige me to pay your debts, your professions

of gratitude will be more pleasing than my love,

and your friend's taste is too good to take mine

in exchange." "How, my dear HYPOLITUS," cried LEANDER, "did you speak to her in this manner?" Just as I have told you," replied he, and I assure you she is pleased when you are the subject of our conversation."

White they entertained each other in this manner, Lucilla arrived at lord Bebroad's, and was at first greatly embarrassed to find out what she wished to know; the greatest part of the servants were entirely ignorant of it, and those few that were in the secret did not date acquaint her with it; but at last having enquired of the steward; he could not well refuse telling her, as it was by her means he was placed in the earl's family; but it is impossible to describe her gries, when he informed her that she was gone to France, her tears and complaints witnessed the sincerity of her love for her dear lister, and throwing herself on a couch, remained for some time in an agony mor to be expressed; but what encreased her grief was the manner in which she should make her brother acquainted with this missfortune, searing his being told such dreadful news might occasion his wounds to break out a fresh; and that in case she did not acquaint him with it, she seared it might be prejudicial to her dear Julia; at last not knowing what to resolve on, she bethought herself of consulting with signior Leander, to know in what manner she should conduct herself.

HYPOLITUS waited impatiently for her return, and as soonas he was informed of her being come, he sent to desire her presence, and notwithstanding her endeavours to conceal her emotion, he perceived by her looks that something had greatly affected her. "Answer me sincerely, my dear sister," said he, "has any accident happened to Julia? "you seem as if you would conceal it, but that would be more painful to me, than if I were to know the worst." I did not," replied she, intend to conceal any thing from you; Julia has been taken ill, her great weakness after what had happened in this house, has caused her a most violent sever, though she appeared to me." to be more composed than I had reason to hope."

As the spoke these words, the tears burst from her eyes, though she did all in her power to prevent them " Ah Lucitta," cried Hypotitus, "Iam " more wretched than you are willing to tell me, " fome accident must have happened to JULIA. " I know it by your tears, and by your not having " the power to speak to me. Ah fifter," continued he, finding her yet remain filent, " your " cruelty will kill me? I am in anxiety not to be " expressed; tell me, I beseech you what has " happened? our interests cannot be separated, " and her misfortunes must be mine : I foresee fome terrible event which is encreafed by your " endeavouring to conceal it." LUCILLA perfifted in repeating what she had said before. "You " are no stranger to my love for Julia," contitinued she, " and yet are surprized at my sensibi-" lity! but you would have much more reason to " be furprized if I was indifferent," " My heart " forebodes some terrible misfortune," replied Hy-POLITUS fighing, " and believe me, my dear " fifter, it is very difficult to deceive a true lover : " but I will myfelf go to lord BEDFORD's and un-" fold this mystery at the hazard of my life." In speaking these words he called his gentleman to Mift

t

affift him in getting up. The gentleman was but just returned from London, where Hypolitus had fent him to acquaint lord Sussex of the adventure which had happened at lord Nevrl's, requesting in his letter to enquire if lord Dov GLAS had not heard of it; and if he did, to let him know it, that he may take precautions to prevent his being discovered. When Lucilly law her brother was determined to go notwithstanding his wounds, the approached LEANDER, and in a low voice, "Oh fir," faid flie, what fhall we do! the " unfortunate Julya is not at Berkshire; her lord " has carried her to France, and I know not in " what manner to acquaint my brother with this " fad news; he is determined to go to my lord "Be Drogb's, and it is not in my power to pre-"vent him," LEANDER was in fuch confernation at hearing this, that he replied, "Alas, madam, it will not be in our power to conceal from "him the truth, and his fears are so violent, that "it is even cruel to keep him thus in suspense."

HYPOLITUS perceiving that they were speaking very low, approached them, being supported by his gentleman, placing himself in an easy chair near LEANDER'S bed, and looking on him with T 3 eyes

eyes in which his despair was lively expressed, " LUCILLA," faid he, " has acquainted you with " what has happened, but I whom it most con-" cerns, am the only person from whom it is con-" cealed." Dear brother," replied LUCILLA, " fince my looks have betrayed my great emotion, " I will without disguise acquaint you with the " truth: The earl of BEDFORD tortured by jea-"loufy, and incensed with the discovery of your " disguise, has carried off Julia to France, with-" out our being able to discover to what place; " and he commanded the fervants whom he left " behind, not to acquaint any person with "the fecret; but his steward has revealed it to " me; this, my dear, brother is really the cause of my affliction, which I wished to conceal from " you, at least for some days." Hypolitus at this folded his arms, leaning his head on his breaft without speaking, and by his sighs only did he difcover the violent pange with which he was feized. " My dear friend," faid LEANDER to him, " this " misfortune is not without its remedy, we shall " foon discover to what place the traitor has con-" veyed her, and you will have the pleasure of be-" being her deliverer; a person of quality is not " to be treated after this manner, merely on ac-" count of his jealous whim." "Ah! how you " flatter me," cried Hypolitus, in a forrowful manner, " I am torn with anguish when I reflect " that it is I who am the cause of Julia's mis-" fortunes, and it is my own impatient defires to " fee her that has plunged her into this difficulty, " yet you would refer me to time to foften her " griefs, as well as my own, which is but a poor " confolation. Gracious heaven! when will my " misfortunes have an end?" While he afflicted himself thus, without bounds, which greatly distressed LEANDER and LUCILLA, a footman acquainted them that the earl of Sussex was just arrived, which greatly furprized them; and a moment after he entered the room; he was not a little amazed at the marks of grief which appeared on their countenance. Hypolitus embraced him. without having power to rife, and making him fit near him, " Are you come, my dear friend," faid he, " to share my grief, at a time that I never " had greater cause for affliction." " I know " not of any new cause, my dear Hypolitus, faid he, " but I thought it was necessary to come " myfelf to acquaint you, that your father is in-" formed

" formed where you are, and will fet out to-mor-" row for this place, being greatly incenfed at " your proceedings; consider therefore what is " proper to be done in this case. I would advise " that you should without delay inform lord NE-" VIL that your father desired me to conduct you " to London; mean while I will convey you to a " place of fafety, where you will be at liberty to " follow your own inclinations," Hypolitus instead of making an answer to what his friend told him, feemed liked one distracted, crying out in a frantic manner, " What ! shall I never fee " her more? has the tyrant torn her from me? "He has! he has! and the dreadful thought has " almost robbed me of my fenses." Lord Sussex was greatly furprized at these words, looking at LUCILLA as if for an explanation, and she immediately acquainted him with the whole affair. "These are indeed new misfortunes," said he to Hypolitus, " but you must endeavour to fur-" mount them; therefore let us fet out immedi-" ately, as it would vex you at present to be in " your father's power; but when we are at a di-" stance, and in a place less suspected than this, " we will then consider in what manner we may affid the fair Joefa. wor iniaugan et lielem "

THEY

t

S

e

THEY were all of his opinion. " I am going to " lofe you lovely Lucilla," faid Leander, to her in a low voice not to be overheard, " friend-" ship now triumphs over love, but do me justice " for the facrifice I make, fince it is in favour of " a brother whom you have often told me was " dearer to you than life. I join my fortune to his, " I follow him and leave you, madam, whom I " adore; give me at least the fatisfaction of know-" ing that you are not infensible to the greatness of " my passion for you, or my esteem for him." "I " owe you too much," replied Lucilla blushing, " and I have more gratitude than to fee with in-" difference the friendship you have shewn for my " brother; do not at present desire a more particu-" lar explanation of my fentiments in your favour, " but be affured that I do justice to your merits, " and that your departure gives me great concern." The happy LEANDER was overjoyed at having obtained fuch an obliging farewel.

His wounds had reduced him to as low a state as that of Hypolitus, which made lord and lady Nevil do all in their power to prevent their departure, not knowing that lord Douglas was to be there next day, and that they had particular rea-

fons

fons for avoiding him. HYPOLITUS and LEAN-DER returned thanks to their kind entertainers, for all the favours they had received. LUCILLA did not part from her dear brother without shedding, many tears, and he promised to write often to her. LEANDER having asked permission to acquaint her with their future adventures, she was rejoiced at such a plausible pretence for granting him what she herself most ardently desired.

THE earl of Sussex mounted his horse, leaving his chariot to his wounded friends, and conducted them to a magnificent cattle forty miles from lord NEVIL's. It belonged to the young marchioness of Northampton; this lovely widow overwhelmed with the misfortunes of her lord, (whowith the duke of NORTHUMBERLAND WETE exexecuted for rebellion, together with John Dun-LEY earl of WARWICK) retired to the country, where the gave full scope to her grief. Queen MARY had not as yet restored her to favour, though the earl of Sussex endeavoured all in his power to obtain her pardon, and his ill fuccess gave him no little trouble. His indifference could not withstand the charms of this lovely widow, having frequently feen her fince her lord's death : Her virtue.

fuch a strong impression on his heart, that what he at first took for pure compassion was the effects of real love.

IT was in this agreeable retreat that she received HYPOLITUS and LEANDER, with the most unfeigned marks of friendship. Her own misfortunes rendered her more capable of feeling, and confequently of endeavouring to alleviate the diffreffes of the afflicted, than any other person; and she was greatly moved at the subject of Hypotarus's grief, which the earl of Sussex imparted to her; and in return she defired his lordship to assure him, that the would take great pleafure in ferving him, requesting that he may command her purse, and that he might remain in her house as long as he found it convenient. Though Hypolitus was insensible to every thing, yet he retained a deep Tenfe of her generofity; and notwithstanding his profound melanchely, he thanked her in a manner fuitable to her civilities. that the fire who had the good fortune to meet and the interim the earl of Douga As arrived at dord Newrits, and dwas in the greatest fury integrable, at hearing of his soh's departure, and did every every thing in his power to discover what road they had taken; but lord Sussex who foresaw this step, had travelled only by night, and through by-roads, which made their route impossible to be be traced. The amiable Lucilla alone bore the effects of her father's rage, who loaded her with reproaches, and accused her of being aiding in Hypolitus's disobedience; he took her with him to London, when he became so much attached to his own interest, that the ill usage which the amiable Julia received, made no impression on him, and he was quite insensible to her missortunes.

Hypolitus, confulted with his friends on the most probable means of succeeding in the present situation of his affairs, and as the earl of Bedrond had got the advantage of them by several days journey, they imagined it would be impossible to overtake him, but thought it adviseable to separate, and wait at the usual places where people embarked in France to come over to England; resolving that the first who had the good fortune to meet him, should fight him, and by that means revenge the outrages which Julia had received at his hands. As soon as Hypolitus and Leanner

were

mention be defired his local tip to affine

were recovered from their wounds, so as to be able to depart, in order to put their plan in execution, they wrote to LUCILLA, leaving their letters to the marchioness of NORTHAMPTON, and having returned her thanks for all her goodness, they took a tender farewel of each other. " What am I not " indebted to you, my dear friends," cried Hr-POLITUS, embracing them, " you espouse my " quarrel, you expose yourselves to revenge my " cause, and instead of opposing your intentions, " as I should do, I on the contrary intreat you to " do all in your power to find out my enemy, " which will indeed be the marks of real friend-" ship." They requested he would not make himself uneasy on their accounts; and once more affured him, that they would use every method to find the earl of BEDFORD, and revenge his cause. They also agreed to stay one month in the ports where they intended to go, and then to return to the earl of Sussex's house in London. The earl went to Dieppe, Hypolitus took the road to Calais, fignior LEANDER accompanied him as far as Dover, and faw him embark, and himself failed for the islands of Jersey and Guernsey, as the earl of BEDEORD might pass through them in order to return privately to England.

U

THEIR

THEIR voyages were prosperous; but we must leave them and fellow HYPOLITUS to Calais where he chanced to put up at the very inn where Julia reposed herself but a few days before. He enquired if they had feen her, and on his describing her perfon, and that of her lord, the hoftefs informed him that she had lain there one night ; at this intelligence he made all the enquiries that might be expected, but in particular if the appeared fad, or what the faid, in fine he omitted nothing that could farisfy his curiofity, and defired to have the same chamber which she had occupied; being conducted to it he entered it with as great emotion as if she had yet been there; he walked about the room in a profound meditation, and cast his eyes towards the the window on which she had written, but how was he furprised and rejoyced at seeing the well known characters of his dear Julia. He kiffed the lines with rapture and taking out the square of glass which contained them, it was more precious to him than all the treasure of the East; and this token of her love, added new strength to his, filled him with gratitude, and became dearer to him than life. He used every possible means not to mils the earl of BEDFORD in his return in case he passed through Calais. Hs

f

re

A

d

n

He waited three weeks with the utmost impatience wishing for nothing so ardently as to have it in his power to punish him and revenge JULIA; when one evening he perceived the earl at a distance, going towards the harbour, where a boatwaited to put him on board the packet. Hy-POLITUS at this fight was transported with rage, and having foon overtaken him, " Before you fet " out for England," faid he, with hercenes, " I " must speak with your lordship." The earl irritated at the manner in which Hypolitus addressed him, but more fo by the repeated causes of vexation which he imagined he had received from him, immediately followed him. They spoke not, but frequently looked on each other with eyes. sparkling with rage ; as soon as they sound themfelves at liberty, they loft no time, but immediately drew their fwords, and being animated, the one with love and vengeance, the other by jealoufy and refentment, began a combat which was not to end but with the life of one, or perhaps both. Having each received feveral wounds, HYPOLITUS fired with rage, at meeting fuch reliferace, from one whom he hated so violently, redoubled his efforts, and in an instant overthrew his enemy, and was defiring him to beg his life, which he generously determined to grant on condition that he should fet Julia at liberty, when his lordship's footman (who had followed his mafter at a diffance, and concealed himself behind a fishing bark which lay on the shore) seeing the danger his master was in, stole to Hyporitus's back and wounded him desperately, on which he fell to the ground streaming with blood. The footman having raifed his mafter, and affifting him to walk, they foon arrived at a fisherman's hut, where he threw himself on a bed, while a furgeon was fent for to drefs his wounds; but as his lordship did not chuse to remain at Calais, he ordered himself to be conveyed to a vessel ready to fail for Dover, taking the furgeon with him for fear his wounds should grow worse by the motion of the veffel, varies and so a oger filly and head

U 2

MEAN while the unfortunate Hypolitus remained without affiliance, covered with blood, and as the night was far advanced, there was no prospect of his meeting with any in such a retired place; but his gentleman who loved him with the utmost affection, finding he did not return, and fearing some accident had happened, went to seek him, ordering his servants to take different ways, with each a lighted torch, and having enquired

folyases feater, they loft as that, but immedi-

d

n

1

of every one after their mafter, who was now pretsy well known in Calais; some of them were directed to the harbour, where he was feen to go with a person who seemed to be a man of quality; but scarce were they come to the fisherman's hut when they perceived the marks of blood on the frand, which the earl of BEDFORD had loft in going thither, and following the track, came at last to the place where their master lay, without fense or motion. They cut down some branches from the trees which grew near that place, and made a kind of litter, that they might with the greater ease convey him to his lodgings. His wounds were so dangerous that his gentleman wrote immediately to lord Douglas to acquaint him with the melancholy fituation of his mafter. This news troubled him greatly, as Hypolitus was his only fon, therefore it is easy to imagine in what manner this was received by all his family. Lord Douglas, the counters and Lucil-LA, set out immediately for Calais, and found him almost expiring; which made his parents, though too late begin, to reproach themselves for having endeavoured to destroy a passion so just and innocent as that of their fon, who notwith U 1. ftanding standing what he had suffered, was greatly concerned at the violence of their grief, which he conjured them to moderate, unless they chose to put an end to his life. The earl of Sussex and LEANDER arrived at London, almost at the same time, and being informed of their friend's having fought with lord BEDFORD, together with the unfortunate confequences of the duel, they refolved to visit him at Calais, and accordingly set out together. Hypotitus was as much rejoiced at feeing those dear friends as it was possible for a perfon in his fituation to be; and they beheld his dangerous illness with the greatest affliction." His extreme weakness did not prevent him from prefenting LEANDER to lord DougLAS, and to the countefs his mother, conjuring them at the fame time to look on him as their fon; and that if he died they would be fo good as to let his friend fupply his place, which drew tears from al! present; but at last, in about two months they began to have some hopes of his recovery.

SIGNIOR LEANDER who was violently in love with LUCILLA, requested lard Sussex to speak in his favour to the earl of Douglas, to know if his alliance would be agreeable, that he might lose no time in writing to the fenator ALBERTI, his father. The great friendship that sublisted between lord Douglas and the fenator, added to LEANnea's personal merit, and great fortune, had the defired effect on his lordship who as he could not possibly expect a better match for his daughter, received his proposals with great fatisfaction. LEANDER transported with joy, wrote to his father, and requested one of his intimate friends, to whom he also wrote, to speak in his behalf. He asked the senator's pardon for the pretence he made of going to Rome, acquainting him with all the reasons which he thought would excuse him; he then described the perfections of LUCILLA, how greatly her father was influenced in his fayour, and befought the fenator not to refuse his confent, to what he most earnestly desired, and which would make him happy for life. nator ALBERTI was greatly furprized at LEAN-DER's having gone to England, instead of going to Rome; for he had hitherto acted with fo much prudence that his father imagined him to be yet in Rome, but he would not let his anger prevail over the happiness and wishes of his son; as he was no stranger to the family of lord Douglas.

and had seen Hypolitus, whom he greatly esteemed, he judged of Lucilla's accomplishments by those of her brother, and readily gave his consent to the proposed alliance, sending the necessary orders to enable Leander to make a figure suitable to his quality and fortune.

HYPOLITUS was beginning to recover when this joyful news reached his fifter and friend, in whose felicity he rejoiced as much as he would have done in his own, and the pleasure he received at the happiness of his fifter, and friend, contributed greatly to his being foon entirely out of danger; the phylicians and furgeons affured him it would be very necessary for him to drink the waters of Bourbon, but he refused to comply, being entirely occupied by his revenge; and though he could scarce stand, he determined to go to England, in order to feek the earl of BEDFORD, whom he refolved to kill, or be killed by; but the tears of the counters his mother, the entreaties and. even commands of his lordship, joined to the permalive eloquence of the amiable Lucilla, whom he could no longer relift, made him promife to follow their advice. As foon as he was able to the, the marriage of his friend to his fifter was for lemnizedi.

lemnized, to the entire fatisfaction of those two equally tender lovers.

Four months were elapsed fince the combat between the earl of BEDFORD and HYPOLITUS, whose wounds were now healed, and he was able to bear the motion of a carriage. LEANDER's equipage was preparing with the greatest expedition, and as the counters defigned to accompany her daughter to Florence, the lords Douglas and Sussex returned to London, the latter promifed to write to Hypolitus at Bourbon, and acquaint him with every thing that should happen. " Let' " me hear in particular," faid Hypolitus, " concerning the lovely marchioness of NORTHAM?-TON; the love you have for her, as well as my or pressing obligations will not suffer me to be in-" different, in regard to your mutual happiness, " and if any thing is capable to alleviate the bit-" ternels of my fufferings, it will be feeing you " and she happy in each other." They then embraced with the utmost tenderness; and his lordship turning to fignior LEANDER, for whom he had a great friendship, "You are going," said he, " to deprive us of a most valuable acquaintance, "but yet it is impossible to regret any happiness " that

"that you are possessed of, as you are every way

"fo deserving of it." Leander acknowledged this compliment as it deserved; and having embraced each other with marks of esteem they parted.

HYPOLITUS accompanied the countels, his fifter and her spouse to Moulins, and from thence to Lyons; they continued their journey to Italy, but he remained at Bourbon, which is but four leagues from Moulins. The joy of the new married pair had not the least effect on Hypolitus who feemed buried in a profound melancholy, with which they fometimes reproached him, but he replied with an air of fadness, " Let it suffice, my dearest " friends that I behold your happiness without " pain, which in my present situation is the great-" est mark of friendship I can give. Alas! do " you imagine that your felicity does not bring to " my remembrance the misfortunes which over-" whelm me? your courtship was not interrupted. " by a moments disquiet, and hymen now crowns " your love I you had not even time to be racked " with fears, hopes, and doubts; or to be in dread " of rivals, croffes, or uneafinefs." These reflections threw him into a lowness of spirits from which they could could scarce raise him; and in these kind of converfations did they pass their time till their arrival at Moulins, where they left Hypolitus, This parting was very tender, as the countess and Lucilla dared not flatter themselves with the hopes of seeing her brother for some time, and LEANDER who loved Hypolitus almost as well as Lucilla, was not unmoved. That unfortunate lover gratefully acknowledged the obligations he had to his fifter and friend; his love for JULIA not having in the leaft deprived him of gratitude or good nature, he entreated them to use every possible means to see the earl of WARWICK, from whom he had not received any news fince his departure from Marfeilles, charging them to acquaint his lordship of his daughter's confinement, as he had already caused an account of it to be written to him by his friend from Calais, and his not having received any answer gave him great uneafiness.

HYPOLITUS arrived at Bourbon, which is a place very badly fituated; the houses are by no means handsome; its springs, whose waters are continually boiling, being the only thing for which it is remarkable, and which brings a great deathor company every season; but that to him was rather

troublefome

is moldle on a troublesome, being ever less disquieted when alone. In this folitude he lived at Bourbon, without making any acquaintance; and as he was obliged to exercife, he always chose those walks which were the least frequented; and though in these places of general refort it is the custom to address each other with an entire freedom, yet they never attempted to interrupt his melancholy. He went out one morning to take his usual exercise, after having drank the waters, and taking the most unfrequented path, walked infentibly into a grove, which prefented a thousand beauties to his view, and stopping near the declivity of a hillock, whose summit was agreeably shaded from the scorching rays of the fun, by feveral tall trees, and having feated himself, began to contemplete his misfortunes. He remained for some time in a profound meditation, without taking any notice of a paper that lay near him; he at last perceived it, but thinking it was a letter, and being no ways curious would not take the trouble of stobping for it; but the paper being agitated by the wind, the thought of its being of consequence to the person who lost it, made him at last take it up, to prevent its falling into other hands; finding fomething wrapped in the paper

3

e

3

paper, he unfolded it and found a shagreen box within, which he opened; but how was he furprized and overjoyed at finding it to be the picture of his Julia; for at first he thought it was her's, but having examined it with greater attention, he knew it to be drawn for the late counters' of WARWICK, which he had frequently feen with' his mistress. He kept his eyes fixed on this object, which recalled to his remembrance many fad, and tender ideas, and he was in a deep contemplation at the occasion of his finding it in this place. " It belongs to Julia," faid he, " and yet there is he' " probability of her having given it to any one; " yet it might have been ftole. - I have feen it in " a box fet round with brilliants, and it is now in " one of shagreen! -- But if it was stole, was it here or in England, the theft was com-" mitted? it is most probable the thief is in " this country." While he made these reflections. he perceived a perfor of a middling appearance; coming towards him, and who observing the picture in his hand, seemed greatly rejoiced. " I must ewn, fir," faid he, addressing himself to Hypoti-Tus, with the greatest respect, " that I was in great trouble, not knowing what was become to " ide dey ; bet hevi Kold fome prin it ge to a

" of the picture you found, and which I request " you will be so good as to return me." " Do me " the pleasure first," faid Hypotitus, " to tell " me where you had it?" " Sir," replied he, "I " am a painter, I come every feafon to Boutbon, " to fell fome paintings, which it is eafier for me " to do here among the nobility, then at any other " place; I go frequently to an abby, two leagues " from hence, called the abby of St. Menoux, " the lady abbess has a closet which she intends " to have prnamented with pictures, that are to " be placed in frames already hung; the brought " me to fee them, and promifed me employment. "While we were in the closet, a hady entered, " who teemed by her accent to be a foreigner, " the was furprizingly beautiful, though fo very " pale, that I concluded the was but just begin-"ning to recover from a dangerous illness. She " alked me if I could repair the drapery of a little "picture, on which the had spilt some water, and " ordering her fervant to fetch it, took it from a " box, fet round with brilliants, and gave it to me, " I put it in this case, which I chanced to have " in my pocket, promiting to do it for her as foor " as possible; fo having finished it, am to return it this day; but having fold some paintings to a ... perfos

Ü

e

T

" person of quality, whom I came to seek in the walks, I suppose I must have pulled out this case with something else, and so let it fall."

HYPOLITUS was so overjoyed, that he had not the power to interrupt him, nor could he at first believe what he heard to be true; at last fighing profoundly, " if you will be faithful, faid he, and " ferve me, you shall find that your journey here " has not been unprofitable. I am grateful and " ready to ferve you, but I must infut on your " keeping what I shall defire, a profound secret." The painter believing it was to draw the picture of some lady with whom he had fallen in love at Bourbon, replied, that his fidelity was proved almost every day, and that no person had as yet found fault with him; that his conception was fo ftrong that provided he once faw the person, he would. draw an exact refemblance. Hypolitus could: not forbear smiling at the painters great opinion of his skill; " It is not a picture I want to have-" drawn," faid he, " but you must find the means " to conduct me to the abby of St. Menoux, "which I think will not be very hard for you to . " accomplish; I am quite unknown to every perfon there, and may therefore pass for your pu-" pil X 2

" pil. I know enough of drawing not to be em-

" my accent is foreign) that I am an Italian.

"You must also agree to do the work the abbess

" intends, at whatever price she offers, and do not

"trouble yourfelf about the confequences, as I " will make you ample amends." The painter did not refuse so advantageous an offer, especially as he saw no danger in executing it.

THE journey was delayed no longer than till the evening, when they took coach, as HYPOLITUS was yet too weak to venture on horseback. He told the painter that during his stay at St. Menoux, his name should be HYACINTH; having changed his dress the better to personate the part he intended to perform, and having ordered the coach man to drive as fast as possible, they were not long on their journey. He was seized, at his arrival, with such a violent emotion, and trembled in fuch a manner that he could fcarce stand; nor could he without great difficulty enter the parlour where the abbels came to speak to the painter. She enquired who HYPOLITUS was ? for though he affected great fimplicity in his dress and manner, yet the air of nobility, which always accompanied him, was fo remarkable.

m-

(as ess

not s I

lid

23

he

d

13

is

d

help being struck with admiration. The painter informed her, that he was an Italian who had a great inclination for painting, and that he had been instructing him for some time. The abbess told him she wanted to have her picture drawn, and defired they would call next day, as she had as much business as would employ them for a year.

Norming but this glad tidings could have confoled Hypolitus for his disappointment at not. feeing Julia; he arofe next morning before day, causing the painter to do the same, and they immediately went to St. Menoux. When the abbels had rifen they entered the convent; Hypolitus cast his eyes on every fide, hoping at least to be bleffed with the fight of his dear JULTA; his mind was in great agitation; but he dared not betray his impatience, for fear of being suspected, and perhaps discovered; and he even dreaded the approach of his miftress, least on her feeing him to unexpectedly the would not be able to conceal her joy and furprize, which would be fufficient to discover them. When they came into the abbefs's closes, the placed herself in the attitude in which the choic to be drawn; and Hypolitus that he X 3 , might might not appear altogether useless, began to grind and mix the colours; it is true he did it bad enough, being quite ignorant of the method, but it was sufficient for him to be seen occupied.

As painters are naturally grave, the abbess began to be tired, and fearing it would prejudice her picture, "I think," faid she, " that you painters " generally have some pleasant anecdotes, with " which you amuse those whose pictures you are " drawing, and I find myself beginning to grow " very ferious, unless you tell me fomething that " will divert me." " I am too much engaged, " madam," replied CARDINI, (this was the painter's name) " to obey your commands, besides I " have not wit enough to entertain you agree-" ably; but here is HYACINTH whom I carry " on purpose to entertain the ladies; his conver-" fation is tolerably agreeable." " Speak to me " then, HYACINTH," faid fhe, " fince CARDINA " defires it." Hypolitus blufhed at the painter's discourse, and so little was he inclined to break filence, that he replied with feeming pain and indifference, that he knew not what to fay; but the abbels continued her entreaties in fo prefling a manner, that he feared she would be displeased if he did did not comply, endeavouring therefore, to overcome his impatience, he thus began a tale, after the manner of the fairies:

" THE empire of Russia is such an extreme cold " country that the mildness of more temperate " climates is scarce ever felt there; its mountains " are almost continually covered with snow, and "the trees are fo loaded with ificles, that when " the fun darts on them his rays, they appear as if " covered with chrystal. Its forests are of a pro-" digious extent, in which the white bears make " dreadful havock; they are continually purfued " by hunters, and many are killed, though not " without great difficulty and danger; this sport " being the noblest and chiefest occupation of the "Ruffians. They were governed by a young or prince named ADOLPHUS, who was extremely " beautiful, and withall fo polite and sprightly, " that one would have imagined it impossible to " find in fuch a rude, uncivilized country, a prince of fo very well accomplished. Though he had not " attained his twentieth year, he had already fup-" ported a war against the Muscovites, in which he had shewn the most intrepid courage, joined to the most admirable conduct. When he or-" dered

" dered his army into quarters to partake of the " bleffings of peace, he never enjoyed himfelf, but " followed that dangerous divertion of bear hunt-" ing. One day when he was at this sport with " a numerous retinue, he was so engaged in the " chace, that none of the hunters could keep up " with him, and having in the eagerness of his " pursuit after one of these animals, entangled " himself in the thickest part of the forest, he " loft his way; and now perceiving himself to be " alone, that it was growing late, and being over-" taken by an unexpected from, was obliged to " make towards the road, and found his horn, " But it was to no purpole, and all at once it grew " fo dark that nothing could be perceived but flash-" es of lightening; the thunder roared most hor-" ribly, and the wind and rain feemed to encreafe." " The prince took shelter under some trees, but " was foon obliged to quit the place on account " of the torrents of water that poured down on " every fide; he at last resolved to leave the for " rest, and seek some safer place, to defend him " from the effects of fuch a dreadful ftorm. He " had great difficulty in regaining the plain, where he found himfelf yet more exposed to the " fur

"fury of the tempest, when casting his eyes on " every fide, he perceived feveral lights, which " feemed fituated on an eminence, and making " towards them as well as the darkness would " permit, he at last arrived at the foot of a high " and almost inaccessible mountain, full of preci-" pices, and very steep, and in searching for a " path, by which he may afcend the mountain, he " arrived at the mouth of a great cavern, in " which he perceived a light, which was the same " he had feen before! He confidered with himfelf " for some time before he entered, as he imagined " it might be the residence of a gang of highway-" men, who ravaged the country by frequent in-" curtions, and who perhaps might rob and mur-" der him, without the least danger to themselves; " as the minds of princes are greater than those " of other men, he reproached himself with his " fear, and boldly entered the cavern, having his " hand on the hilt of his fword, that he may be " ready to defend himself if attacked; he was " feized at once with fuch a chillness, that he " thought himself dying." I have a discount " el deponder wer, their careir public up and

^{. &}quot; At the noise he made in walking, an old woman

" woman came out of the cavern; the was greatly " furprised at seeing the prince. You are the first " mortal, faid she, I ever faw in this place ; do " you know my lord whose habitation it is? No, " good woman, replied ADOLPHUS, I am quite " ignorant of it. It is, refumed the, the dwelling of " Æotus, the god of winds; he lives in this caern with all his children, I am their mother, " and you find me alone, because they are busied " in doing good and evil in the world; but, conti-" nued she, as you seem to be drenched with the " rain that has fallen, I will make a fire to dry you; " but what troubles me most, my lord is, that you-" will fare but poorly in this place, as the food of the winds is fo very light that mortals have need . " of fomething more fubstantial, The prince thanked her for her civility, and placed himself by " the fire, which was kindled in a moment by the " WESTERN WIND, who was just returned. He " was scarce arrived when the North East, and " feveral Northern Winds entered the cavern : " Æolus did not tarry, and Boreas, East, " South East, and Noath winds followed him, " all dropping wet, their cheeks puffed up, and their hair diffhevelled. Their behaviour was rude, and er and uncivilized, and when they spoke to the w prince, they almost froze him with their breath. "One related how he had difperfed a whole fleet; another that he had fhipwrecked feveral veffels; " and a third, that he had been favourable to some, " having faved them from falling into the hands of firstes who would have taken them prisoners; " others related that they had torn up large trees " by the roots, and blown down houses and walls; " in fine they all bragged of their exploits. The old woman heard them with great attention, but all at once feeming very uneafy, did you not meet your brother ZEFHYRUS faid the? it is now " late, and he is not yet returned, which makes me in pain for his fafety. While they were telling her they had not feen him, ADOLPHUS perceived " at the enterance of the cavern, a youth, fair as " the god of love, his wings (the white plaines of " which being mixed with those of a flesh colour) were of fo fine and delicate a texture, that they "feemed in continual motion; his flaxen hair formed into a thousand ringlets, fell with negligence on his shoulders; his head was bound with a garland of roles and jalamines, and his air was lively and agreeable, had jibb a dout shap of "

and uncivilized, and when they fosher to the "WHENCE come you, little libertine ? faid the "old woman to him in a hoarse voice, your bron "there are already returned, and you are the on-" ly one that pass your time without confidering " the uneafiness I have on your account. Mother, " replied he, I am forry for having been obliged. " to flay fo late, knowing it would displease you, " but I was in the princess Felicia's garden. "where she walked accompanied by her nymphs, " fome of whom formed garlands of the choicest, " flowers, others feated on moffy banks, uncovered " their necks that I might with greater ease ap-" proach and kifs them, and feveral danced and " fung. The fair princess was retired to an orange " grove, my breath went to her lips, I played " around her and gently fanned her veil. ZEPHY: " RUS, faid fhe, how agreeable thou art ! as long " as thou remained here, I will not leave this walk. I must confess, that such flattering words as these, spoken by such a lovely person, as the " princess, enchanted me; and I was so little man " fter of myself that nothing but the fear of your " displeasure, could ever have made me resolve " to quit fuch a delightful place. ADOLPHUS " took areanW n

" took fo much pleasure in hearing him speak," " that he feemed troubled when he had done." " Permit me, lovely ZEPHYRUS, said he, to alk " you in what country does this charming princess " reign ? In the island of Felicity, replied ZEPHY-" RUS, where none are permitted to enter, nor yet " are they tired with feeking it; but the fate of " mortals is fuch, that they cannot find it, though " they fometimes imagine themselves to be near " it; because they frequently arrive at other small " islands, where they enjoy some tranquillity, and " where many would romain with pleasure, but "these islands which have but a faint resem-" blance to that of Felicity, being ever in motion, " are foon out of fight, and it is ENVY (who can-" not bear that mortals should flatter themselves " with enjoying even the shadow of repose) that " drives them from those places. I see perish al-" most every day, men of the most distinguished " merit, in endeavouring to arrive at the island of " Felicity. The prince continued to question him. " to which he replied with the greatest wit and 44 exactness. Want made bire was your dangerouse by

" Ir being very late, the old woman commanded her children to retire to their den. Zz-

美国共享出来。科

" PHYRUS offered part of his little bed to the " prince, because it was neat, and in a much s warmer fituation, than any of the other cavities " of the grotte. It was composed of dried grass, " covered with flowers, ADOLPHUS threw him-" felf on it, and paffed the remainder of the " night with ZEPHYRUS in talking of the prin-" cess Felicia. How rejoiced I should be to see " her, faid the prince, and I doubt not but with " a little of your affiftance, I might eafily fatisfy my " curiofity. ZEPHYRUS affured him, the enter-" prize would be very dangerous, but that if he " had courage enough to be governed by his di-" rections, he would convey him through the air " on his wings; and I have, continued he, a cloak " which I shall give you, that when you put it on " with the green side out, you will then be inviso fible, which is very necessary towards your pre-" fervation; for if the dreadful monsters who guard " that ifland, should see you, it would be impossi-" ble for you to reful them. ADOLPHUS was fo " impatient to fee the end of this great adven-" ture, that though the proposal which ZEPHY. " Rus made him was very dangerous, yet he ac-# cepted it with all his heart, was anial TI manded has collaren to retire to their den. Za-

SCARCE had AURORA began to appear, when " the impatient ADOLPHUS awoke ZEPHYRUS, who was just beginning to slumber. I have de-" prived you of your repose, said the prince, em-" bracing him, but my generous friend, it is almost " time to depart. Come, my lord, faid he, let us " go; so far from complaining, I shou'd rather " thank you, for I am in love with a proud and ful-" len Rose, with whom I should have a quarrel if "I failed to visit her at the break of day; she is " in one of the borders of the princes Felicia's " garden. In speaking these words he gave the " cloak to the prince as he promised, and thought " to convey him on his wings; but finding that way very troublesome, I shall transport you, my " lord as I did PSYCHE by CUPID's order, when I " conveyed her to the magnificent palace which he " had built on purpose for her. He then took the " prince in his arms, and placing himself on a rock, " began by a steady motion to poise himself, and " extending his wings, took his flight towards the " island of Felicity. Though the prince was very " courageous, he was nevertheless a little fearful, " at finding himfelf thus at fuch a height in the " arms of a youth, but to encourage himfelf, he Y 2 " regarded

" regarded him as a god; and yielding to his fate, " foon regained his former tranquility, and viewed " with attention all the places over which they " flew; what kingdoms and cities, feas and rivers, " mountains, desarts, and woods, what unknown " countries, and different nations! all which fur-" prised, and took from him the power of utte-ZEPHYRUS acquainted him with the " name and manners of all the inhabitants of the " earth. They reposed themselves on those formi-" dable mountains, Caucasus and Athos, and on " feveral others they met in their way. If the fair " Rose, whom I adore, faid ZEPHYRUS, was to " be ever so angry, I cannot conduct you through " fuch an immense space, without letting you en-" joy for some time the pleasure of viewing those " wonders which are now in fight. ADOLPHUS " thanked his friend for his civility, and expressed " his fear, least the princes should not understand " his language, nor he her's. Do not be uneasy at " that, faid the god, for her's is univerfal and I am " confident you will foon understand each other.

"He flew with fuch quickness, that at last this long wished for island began to appear, and by the many beauties which attracted the eyes of
the

" the prince, he easily imagined it to be a most " enchanting place; the air was entirely perfum-" ed, the dew being composed of the most ex-" cellent orange flower water, and the rain of rose " water. The fountains played to a prodigious " height, in the forests were the most exquisite trees " and the gardens were full of the choicest and most " delicious flowers; rivulets ran on every fide, " with a fweet murmuring, and the birds perform-" ed concerts more melodious than those of the " best performers. The fruit grew spontaneously, " and tables most elegantly set out, appeared at a " moment's wish; but nothing could equal the " palace, the walls of which were of diamonds, " the floors and cielings of jewels, formed into a " variety of compartments; gold was there more " plenty than stones; the furniture had been " wrought by the hands of fairies, and disposed " in fuch an elogant manner, that it was impossible " to determine which had the greatest advantage, " its arangement or magnificence. ZEPHYRUS " fet down the prince on a beautiful grass plot, " My lord, said he, I have performed my pro-" mise, and I now leave you to yourself. Having embraced each other, ADOLPHUS thank-Y 3 daidw trat nast

"ed him as he deserved; and the god impatient to visit his mistress, left him in those desicious gardens; he ran over several walks, and viewed many grottoes, designed purposely for recreation; in one of which was the statue of a cupid in white marble, of such exquisite workmanship that it must certainly have been the master-piece of some great artist; from his torch proceeded a fountain instead of slames; he reclined against a rock of shells, seeming to read the following words, which were engraved on a ta-

THOSE WHO ARE IGNORANT OF THE PERSON OF LOVE, HAVE NEVER TASTED TRUE FELICITY; IT IS LOVE ALONE THAT COMPLEATS ALL OUR WISHES, AND MAKES LIFE AGREEABLE; WITHOUT IT THE GREATEST RICHES HAVE BUTWEAK CHARMS, AND EVERY THING IN LIFE IS LANGUISHING.

sat to be the pulled to be the court of

"ADOLPHUS next entered an arbour of homey fuckles, whose agreeable obscurity the sun could not penetrate; and it was on a bank of green turf which surrounded a fountain that the prince

" prince furrendered himself to the pleasures of sleep.

" Ir was almost noon when he awoke, and was angry with himself at losing so much time; " but to make amends, he hastened towards the " palace, which he viewed with more attention " than he could before, as he was then at too " great a distance; it seemed as if every art had " combined with equal fuccess to the perfection " and magnificence of this edifice. The prince " wore his cloak with the green side out, by " which he faw every thing without been Teen, " but whether it was that the porch was shut, or " that the doors were on the other fide, he had " not as yet found the enterance; when perceiving " one of the windows opened by a most beautiful " nymph, on which a little female gardener ap-" proached, the nymph let down a large basket " of gold filligree work, tied with feveral knots " of ribbon, commanding her at the same time to " gather fome flowers for the princefs. The little " gardener was not long in obeying her com-" mands, and ADOLPHUS at that instant throw-" ing himself on the flowers, the nymph drew " him up to the window. You must believe that " the

" the green cloak which rendered him invisible,

" had also the power to make him very light; with-

" out this circumstance the nymph could never

" have brought him up to the window. As foon

" as he got out of the basket he entered a great sa-

" loon, where he faw things impossible to describe.

" Nymphs appeared in groupes, the eldest of " which feemed to be but eighteen, though there " were many that were much younger, but they

" had all the finest complection imaginable, and

" fome were very beautiful and well accomplished.

" He would have passed the day in the saloon if

" his curiofity had not been at once awoke by the

" found of feveral voices, that were perfectly in

" tune with instruments which seemed to be

" touched by fome mastely performers; he ad" vanced towards the appartment from whence

" proceeded this agreeable harmony, and the mo" ment he entered, these words were fung;

" Be faithful, be tender, and constantly prove

"The thousand soft transports, that wait upon love:

" But if she proves cruel, yet do not despair

" By patience, and time, you will conquer the fair.

r

1

.

f

e

7

1

"THE prince imagined that nothing could " equal the charms of those he saw in the saloon; " but he was mistaken in a most agreeable man-" ner, the musicians surpassed even the beauty of " their companions, and he understood by a most " wonderful method, the language which was spo-" ker in this palace, though he did not know its " name. He had placed himself behind one of " the most beautiful nymphs, who having by ac-" cident let fall her veil, he took it up and presented " it to her without reflecting on what he did, which " made the nymph give a loud shriek, not see-" ing the person who had taken it up; and per-" haps this was the first time that fear was ever " known in this enchanting place. Her compa-" nions gathered round her and with eagerness " asked the reason of her crying out, You will " think me very whimfical, faid she, but you may " believe me when I tell you, that my veil just " now fell to the ground, and fomething invisible " took it up and gave it to me. At this speech, " they all burst into a loud fit of laughter, and " fome went into the princefs's chamber to divert " her with this tale.

" ADOLPHUS followed them under cover of " his green cloak and having paffed through innu-" merable halls, galleries, and chambers arrived at " last in that of the princess; she was seated on a " throne of one entire carbuncle, more briliant " than the fun, but the princess FELICIA's eyes " were yet brighter than it, her beauty was fo " amazingly perfect, that she seemed to be one of " the fairest daughters of heaven, her person had " altogether fuch an air of youth, wisdom, and " majesty as at once inspired respect and love. " She was genteely and magnificently dreffed. " her flaxen hair was adorned with flowers, her " robe was of gauze mixed with gold, around her " played the loves and graces; some kissed her " hands, others by the help of their companions " climbed up on each fide of the throne, and placed " a crown on her head; it is impossible to describe " the joy and furprise of ADOLPHUS, who seemed " like one enchanted, he could not without diffi-" culty gaze on the dazling beauties of the prin-" cefs and having in the agitation of his mind " let fall the green cloak, immediately became vi-" fible. The princess who had never seen a man " was greatly furprifed. ADOLPHUS being thus " discovered.

discovered, threw himself at her feet in a most respectful manner, Great princess, said he, I " have traverfed the whole universe, to come and " admire your divine beauty; 1 offer you my " heart, and my vows; do not therefore, I befeech " you, refuse them. Though she was very spright-" ly, her furprize made her speechless, as she had " never till that moment feen an object fo lovely " as the prince, whom the imagined to be the only " one of his species in the world. This thought " made her believe he might be the PHOENIX fo " much admired, and fo fcarce; and being con-" firmed in this miftake, Lovely PHOENIX, faid " she, (for such I believe you are, as there is no-" thing in this island that refembles you) I am re-" joiced at the pleasure of seeing you, it is a pity " that you are the only one of your kind in the " world; feveral birds fuch as you would make a " fine appearance in an aviary. ADOLPHUS "fighed at this discourse of the princess with " wonderful grace and simplicity, and having un-" deceived her, took care to acquaint her with " every thing necessary relating to himself, but " never did any scholar improve as fast as she, and the natural acuteness of her wit made her soy good worl out too lat how long you dairem "

" even outstrip the prince's discourses; and they both became violently in love, and felt for each other all that the utmost delicacy could inspire,

"Nothing disturbed their repose, but on the contrary every thing conspired, to make them pass their time agreeably; they were never sick, their health never decayed, and it was in this delicious place that the water of the fountain of youth was drank in plenty; no disquietudes, no jealous suspicions, not even the most trisling disputes which frequently disturb the tranquility of lovers, were ever known in this happy island; they seemed intoxicated with pleasure, and hitherto no mortal had ever such a continuance of good fortune as the prince enjoyed: but as mortality is not perfect, consequently the hapiness of man cannot be lasting.

"ONE day as ADOLPHUS was with the princefs, he bethought himself of asking her how long
he had enjoyed the pleasure of her company,
the moments sly so quick in this happy abode, continued he, that I never once resected how long I have been here. I will satisfy you, replied the, but you must first tell me how long you imagine

magine it to be. He began to reflect, and then " faid, if I was to confult my heart, and the pleafures I enjoy, I should not think it more than eight days, but my dear princess, according " to fome things which occurs to my memory, " I believe it is almost three months. The princess " at this burst into a violent fit of laughter. Know " ADOLPHUS, faid she, in a serious manner that " it is three hundred years. If she could have " known how dearly those words were to cost her, " fhe would have been for ever filent. Three " hundred years, cried the prince amazed, in " what condition then is the world, who governs " at present or what is doing there? and when I " return to it, will any one know me, or shall I " know any one? my kingdom is doubtless in other " hands, than those of my posterity, nor can I flat-" ter myfelf with having one alive at prefent. I " shall be a prince without a kingdom, and be " regarded as a phantom, and I shall be entirely " ignorant of the customs and manners of those " with whom I am to live. The princess losing her " patience, interrupted him, what are you thinking " of, ADÓLPHUS said she, is it thus you return " the love and goodness I have had for you. I " received you in my palace, and made you ma" fter of it, I preserved your life during three ages, you are yet blooming, and perhaps till " this moment, were not wearied with being here; " had it not been for me, you would long fince " have been dead. I am not ungrateful, fair prin-" cess, replied he a little confused, nor am I in-" fensible to all the obligations I owe you; but if " I had died, I might before my death have per-" formed fuch great exploits as would have im-" mortalized my name; but I fee with shame my " arms unemployed, and my name without luftre. " Such was the brave REYNOLD in the arms of " ARMIDIA, but glory fnatched him from her! and it will, I suppose, interrupted the princess shedding a torrent of tears, tear you from mine? "Yes, barbarian as thou art; but fince thou wilt " leave me, thou art become unworthy of the violence of my grief. In speaking these words she " fainted away. The prince was much troubled s as he greatly loved her; but yet he reproached " himself for having passed so much time with one " mistress, and for not having performed one ac-" tion that might rank his name in the lift of he-" roes. In vain did he endeavour to conceal his " displeasure, he fell into a langour which entirely " changed " changed him; and he to whom ages feemed " only months, now thought every hour a century. "The princess who perceived it, was greatly " grieved, though the would not fuffer him to re-" main out of complaifance to her, telling him he " might depart when he pleased, but feared fome " great misfortune would befal him, These last " words gave him much less trouble than the for-" mer did pleasure, and though the thoughts " of leaving the princess made him almost relent, " yet hurried on by his destiny, he bid adieu to her " whom he once adored and yet continued to love; " affuring her that when he had performed some " great action to render himself more worthy " than he now was of her goodness; he would en-" joy no repose till he returned and owned her as " the fovereign and only happiness of his life. His " natural eloquence supplied the defects of his love, " but the princess was too well acquainted with " him to be thus deceived, and fhe had fad fore-" bodings which informed her, that she was going " to lose for ever, a person who was most dear to " her.

"Though she endeavoured to conceal her grief, yet it was not possible. She gave her too inZ 2 "different

"different ADOLPHUS, a magnificent suit of armour, and the finest horse in the world. BIKARREL (so was the horse called) will conduct you to the place; where you are to sight and overcome, but do not dismount till you arrive in your own country; for by the power of enchantment, which I possess from the gods I foresee that if you neglect my advice, BIKARREL cannot save you from the danger you will be in. The prince promised to follow her advice, and having kissed her hand a thousand times, he departed, but with such haste that he forgot his green cloak.

"Having travelled to the borders of the island, the vigorous horse plunged with his master into the river, and swiming to the other side, carried him over hills and vallies, and passed through countries and forests with such quickness that he seemed to sly. One night as he passed through a narrow lane, very rugged and sull of stones, with large ditches on each side, he overtook a cart which lay across the way, and stopped his passage, it was loaded with old wings of different forms, and seemed overturned on the old man who was conducting it. His head er was bald, his voice trembled, and the pain he " fuffered in lying under the weight of the cart, " made the prince have compassion on him. Bi-" KARREL would have leaped the ditch, and was just " going to do fo, when the old man cried out, Ah! " my lord, have pity on my deplorable fituation, " and lend your affiftance, or elfe I shall die. " ADOLPHUS could not refift the defire he had to " affift the old man, and alighting from his horse, " gave him his hand to raise him up; but alas! " how was he furprifed at feeing him rife with fo " much quickness, that he seized the prince before " he had power to defend himself. Have I at last " met you, prince of Russa, said he in a terrible " voice, my name is TIME, I have been feeking " you these three ages, and have wore out all the " the wings with which this cart is loaded, in tra-" verfing the universe to meet with you; but " though you have been fo long concealed, there " is nothing that can escape me. In speaking " these words he put his hand on the prince's " mouth with fuch force that he stifled him.

[&]quot; ZEPHYRUS who passed just at this moment,. " was witness to the unfortunate end of his dear " friend, and as foon as the old barbraian was. Z 3

"gone, he approached him, to fee if he could not by the sweetness of his breath bring him again to life; but all his endeavours were fruitless, and taking him in his arms, he wept bitterly, and conveyed him once more to the gardens of the palace of Felicity, wherehe placed him in a grotto, stretched on a rock whose top was flat and covered him with flowers; he then took off his armour, and having formed a trophy with his arms, engraved the following words on a column of jasper which he placed near the unfortunate prince:

TIME

CONQUERS ALL, AND BRINGS EVERY THING TO PASS;

BEAUTY FADES WITH YEARS,

MAN FORMS IN VAIN A THOUSAND

NEW DESIRES; AND

HIS MIND IS TROUBLED IN THE MIDST OF HIS PLEASURES.

IF HE THINKS HIS DABOURS REWARDED,

SEEMS PLEASED WITH ANY NEW CONQUEST, TOO SOON HE PROVES (BY SOME DREADFUL CALAMITY)

THAT

THERE IS NO LASTING LOVE NOR PERFECT FELICITY IN LIFE. n

f

t

" To this grotto, did the desponding princess " repair every day, fince the departure of her lo-" ver, increasing the fountain with her tears; but " how was she overjoyed at finding him there, " when she thought him at a vast distance. She " imagined he was but just arrived, and that being " fatigued with his journey, he had fallen a fleep, " and was confidering if she should wake him : " her tenderness got the better, and she unfolded " her arms to embrace him, but going a little near-" er, she found too soon the extremity of her mis-" fortunes. The grotto resounded with her cries, " aud her complaints were capable of moving the " most obdurate heart, she commanded the gates " of her palace to be shut for ever, and since that " unfortunate day, no person has ever seen it; " her grief is the cause of her being so rarely seen, " being preceded by inquietude, accompanied " with forrow, which are her constant compani-" ons, and all mankind agree fince that deplorable "adventure, THAT TIME CONQUERS ALL, " AND THAT THERE IS NO PERFECT FELICI-" TY IN THIS LIFE."

HYPOLITUS having ended his ftory, the abbess affured him that she had just then found the truth truth of his observation, and that the fear of fuch an agreeable tale's being ended, had deprived her of the pleasure which she would otherwise have received by hearing it. She greatly praised his manner of telling it, and was once more returning him thanks, when she was interrupted by the entrance of Julia's woman bringing her a compliment from her lady (who kept her bed with a violent head-ach) defiring fhe would lend her a book to amuse her. ISABELLA, said the abbess, I cannot fend her one at present, but conduct HYACINTH to her, and he will amuse her much better than any book, for he has just concluded one of the most agreeable tales I ever heard; and I must request the favour of him to tell it to your lady. And defiring Hypoli-TUS to follow ISABELLA, there was no doubt of his having readily obeyed her, he held his handkerchief to his face that the abbess might not discover his emotion, as also to prevent Is a-BELLA (to whom he was known,) from flewing any fudden furprise at seeing him so unexpectedly in that place. ISABELLA conducted him to Ju-LIA's chamber, and HYPOLITUS having thrown himself on his knees at the fide of her bed, took one of her hands, and kiffed it with the most violent transports, transports, without speaking. The window curtains being closed made the room very dark, and as he still kept his head reclined on her hand she did not immediately know him but endeavoured to withdraw it. HYPOLITUS looking on her ftruggles to loofe her hand, as an undoubted proof of her aversion, let it go in the utmost agony. "You hate me then, my dear Julia," faid he, in a melancholy tone, "you hate me, " and regard me as the cause of your misfor-" tunes; and though I am innocently fo, you " have conceived a fecret horror which makes " my presence hateful," "Ah! what is it you " fay, my dear Hypolitus," cried she, knowing him by his voice, " how little are you ac-" quainted with my fentiments." Having faid these words, she embraced him with a tenderness that plainly convinced her love. Such a favourable reception filled him with joy, and they looked on each other for some moments without having the power to speak, their eyes being the only interpreters of their tender emotions, nor could they forbear sheding tears of joy and sadness, being divided by these two passions; but joy getting the better, nothing could equal the tenderness of their

their meeting, nor could they at first spare a moments time to enquire into the situation of affairs. Such was the case of the lovely Julia and the faithful Hypolitus, and it would be impossible to form any connection from their first conversation, though it may easily be imagined by those who have felt the tender passion of love.

As foon as the abbess had dined, she came up to Julia's apartment, followed by CARDINI, who brought her picture, that she might, have the opinion of her fair captive on the sketch he had taken, and after having given their judgment on it for some time, " Can it be possible madam," said she to Julia, " that you do not thank me for my " care in fending fuch an agreeable person as Hy-" ACINTH to entertain you? he has certainly a " yast deal of wit and can relate a tale better than " the faries themselves." Julia who did not comprehend the abbess's meaning, replied at all events, that the pleasure of seeing her had driven every other thought out of her head; and that if it was agreeable to her, she would be glad to learn to draw, as it would ferve to amuse her when alone. The abbess told her she might learn when she pleased, and that while CARDINI was employed in painting. painting her closet, HYACINTH might teach her, but on condition that she would let him come to tell her stories. HYPOLITUS though he bore no part in the conversation, was transported with joy at the thoughts of seeing his dear JULIA every day, nor would he have changed situations with the greatest monarch on earth.

e

d

đ

2

n

8,

y

13 0

e,

C-

n

g_

AFFAIRS being thus concerted, he never failed passing two or three hours every evening with his mistress; he acquainted her with the marriage of his fifter to fignior LEANDER, at which fhe was greatly rejoyced, her tenderness for her generous friend being as great as ever, as also for her hufband, whom she regarded as a man of great merit, and a particular friend of her dear Hypolitus, to whom she said every thing she thought would please on fuch an agreeable occasion; and he willing to profit by this disposition, said, " if you are so susceptible " of Lucilla's happiness, at least you ought to " contribute towards its encrease by infuring mine; " permit me, therefore, my dear Julia, to con-" duct you from this hateful place, where I am " every moment in danger of being discovered, " and when you are at liberty we will then con-" fult what is next to be done." " But my repu-" putation nation.

" tation, my dear Hypolitus," cried she, in a mournful accent, " my reputation! what will be-" come of that which is dearer to me than life! " My lord has placed me here, only because he " imagines I love you, and yet you would have " me fly. No, my Hypolitus, no; fuch conduct " would only confirm his suspicions, ruin me in " the eyes of the world, and perhaps be the cause " of separating us for ever; do not ask me, my " dear brother, it were a thousand times better for " me to die where I am." " How unjust are you, " madam," replied he, in a melancholy tone, " both to yourfelf and me; can the world find " fault with you for breaking your chains, and " freeing yourself from an imprisonment to which " you were doomed without reason or justice? if " you will not permit me to accompany you, yet I " may follow you. Surely, my dear JULIA, no-" thing is more natural than to endeavour to re-" gain one's liberty; if my love and constancy can " move you, grant to my tears and prayers, what " you have refused to your own desires." "Do not " thus press me, Hypolitus," faid she, " I am " in despair at not being at liberty to grant your " request, and methinks if you loved me as well as 1 2

e-

he

ve

th

in ife

ny

OT

u.

e,

be

h

if

I

oe-

in

at

ot

11

13

u

"you pretend, you would be more sensible of my grief."

HE remained at her feet where he had thrown himself, and fighing profoundly, remained for some time without fpeaking, but at last breaking filence, " Oh Julia," faid he, " is it possible you can re-" fuse my request? your confinement then is plea-" fing, fince you will not make use of a remedy " that would be approved by every one; but alas, " too well I find you hate me." "No my dear "HYPOLITUS," replied she looking on him with ineffable tenderness, and giving him her hand, " no " I do not hate you, nor do I believe you could " think fo even for a moment, I am the same Iu-" LIA who would prefer your repose and happiness " to her's; who will live only for you, but yet loves " her duty and virtue, better than she loves her-" felf. Can you imagine that I am fo happily firm-" ated as not to ardently wish for a change? But " I have fomething to propose which will enable " me to fatisfy you, with becoming decency: Let " us write to my father, and request his presence; " when I am in his company, I shall have no-" thing to fear from calumny." Hypolitus in vain endeavoured to make her fensible of the " length length of the journey, and that a thousand accidents might happen in the interim, but she remained inflexible; therefore to obey her, he inclosed their letter to signior LEANDER, to be forwarded to the earl of WARWICK. JULIA in her letter acquainted her father with all her sufferings since her marriage, as HYPOLITUS did of his good fortune in having discovered the place of her confinement when he least expected it.

MEAN while the abbess gave a strict charge to CARDINI, that neither he nor his pupil, should on any account, receive letters from the fair stranger to forward for her; he promifed he would not, or if he did, it should be to give them to her; he also engaged for the fidelity of HYACINTH, who was a great favourite with the abbess fince he had related the tale of the prince of Russia. It would be impossible to express the pleasure the lovers enjoyed, they faw each other every day and were happier in this cloifter than they would have been at court, Hypolitus acquainted Julia with all that had happened to him fince their separation, and she in turn, informed him of the manner of her being conveyed to this abbey. Thus did they pass their hours, fometimes calling to rememberance their 1-

n-

be

ed

er

e r-

e-

0

n

7

7

e

O

d

£

e

1

of the misfortunes which they had fuffered, and the pleasures they had enjoyed, and in forming. plans of suture selicity. The six months they passed in this manner seeming as short as if they had been in the palace of Felicity.

CARDINI by HYPOLITUS'S order advanced but very flowly in his work, nor was the abbess displeased at it, but rather the contrary, as she had agreed with him at so much a piece for the pictures, the thought they would be much better finished than if they were painted in hafte. Hypoliyus fearing the long abode of his retinue at Bourbon might cause suspicion, on account of his abfence, fent them to Nevers, with orders to remain there, but not to tell they belonged-to him, frequently received letters from lord Sussex and LUCILLA, whom he had acquainted with the happiness he enjoyed; writing at the same time to his father that the phylicians defired he might drink the waters during two feafons, which made him not press his return.

He was greatly rejoiced at hearing that the earl of WARWICK was foon expected in London,

Aa2

all his family were impatient to fee him, being at last acquainted with his not having been killed, and that Julia was his daughter. The earl of BEDFORD was troubled at this news and knew not what to refolve on. The pleasure which Hypo-LITUS enjoyed was also damped by a letter, which he received from the counters his mother, acquainting him that his father was so ill, that if he wished to see him before he died, he must set out immediately. It was then that nature and reason, for a time, overcame love and tenderness; JULIA infifted on his going where his duty called, adding the most pressing entreaties to her advice, and that he might return in company with her father, " and you will then," continued she, " be " mafter of a fortune in which I shall have some " interest; therefore your presence will be very " necessary." All that was tender, fond, and fincere, was faid on this melancholy occasion; and when at last speech failed them, their eyes alone fufficiently expressed the greatness of their grief, Alas how difficult was it for virtue and duty to refift the weakness of a love sick heart, but hope was their support, and they perfuaded themselves, with reason, that they might soon meet again.

CARDINI was charged by HYPOLITUS with the care of transmitting to him all JULIA's letters, and to receive all his for her, not forgetting to make him a fuitable recompence both for his prefent fervices, and those which he yet expected from him. The abbess being told that HYACINTH was defired by his father to return to Italy, was greatly troubled at his departure; but JULIA was inconfolable, and the moment after he fet out, shut herfelf in her chamber, and throwing herfelf on the bed feemed like one just expiring, till happily relieved by friendly shower of tears; and she feigned herself sick that she might have an excuse to keep her room for some days, the better to conceal her grief, which exceeded all bounds, by reason of her not receiving any news from Hypolitus; and having wrote to lord Sussex to know if he or her father were yet arrived at London, she received for answer that he was under great anxiety for both, on account of their not being arrived; that that the earl of DougLas was dead, and that the presence of Hypolitus was extremely necessary, to his affairs; and as we are ever apprehensive of the worst, the unfortunate Julia never doubted hat her lover perished at sea. At parting with him A a 3

she thought nothing could encrease her grief, but alas! she soon found her ill stars had not yet exhausted their unlucky influence, but on the contrary, seemed ingenious in tormenting her in the most cruel manner.

ONE day in which she kept her bed in the utmost dejection of spirits, the abbess came to see her; and let fall, by chance, a letter she had received that morning. When she was gone, IsaBELLA took it up, and presented it to JULIA, who knowing it to be the earl of BEDFORD's hand, she trembling opened it, and read these words:

" MADAM.

"Some very particular reasons, oblige me to

"set out immediately, to remove Julia to a place

"where she will be more concealed than with

"you. I am informed that her father is daily

"expected in London, and that he is acquainted

"with her being at St. Menoux. Be affured, ma "dam, I shall not forget the obligations I owe

"you, nor the desire I have to reward you as you

"deserve, being with respect,

" Madam,

"Your most obedient servant,

"BEDFORD."

THE

THE fair JULIA was quite stunned at reading of this letter, and having confidered on what was proper to be done, thought it best to endeavour to make her escape as soon as possible, rather than expose herself once more to the violence of her lord; and being fixed in her resolution, she desired ISABELLA to inform CARDINI to make some excuse to come to her apartment, as she wanted to fpeak with him, and as foon as he came, she defired him to go to Moullins, and fell fome of her jewels, and then engage a coach, but with the greatest caution, for fear of being discovered : she also defired him to bring her a plain habit, for a difguise, and that when every thing should be ready, to come at night to the abby, with three laddle horfes, to convey her and ISABELLA as far as Moullins, where she was to meet the coach. The only difficulty was to escape from the abby, but as one of her apartments looked into the garden, she was refolved to descend by a ladder of ropes which CARDINI provided; and it very fortunately happened that part of the garden wall fell down a few days before, by which means the might eafily escape.

EVERY thing succeeded according to her wishes, because Carpens had the liberty of going to the abby when he pleased; and he obeyed her orders with the utmost fidelity, conducted her and ISABELLA to Moullins, where the coach waited for them ; JULIA before the entered the carriage, presented the painter with a ring of great price, charging him to haften to London, and acquaint the earl of WARWICK and HYPOLITUS with the reason of her sudden departure from the abby; that she intended going to Florence, to reside with with Luciela, and requested they might direct their letters to her there. She did not think it proper to entrust this in a letter, fearing it might miscarry, or fall into the earl of BEDFORD's hands, as the was certain that fome of her letters, as well those of Hypolitus, had been intercepted, and from thence came the report of her being at Se. Menoux

WHILE she thus travelled at a great rate, taking the utmost precaution for fear of being known or even suspected, Cardini who accompanied her as far as he possibly could, returned to St. Menoux, least he should be suspected of having assisted in her escape; and going to the abby, went to work as usual, expecting every moment to hear the surprize which her escape would occasion. It was very late when one of the nun's came and acquainted the abbess that JULIA's chamber was not yet opened, and that she had called ISABEL-LA and her lady, feveral times, without receiving any answer, which made her apprehensive that fomething extraordinary had happened to them. The abbess was very uneasy at the intelligence, and caufing the door to be broke open, was foon convinced that they made their escape, which almost distracted her, and she immediately sent people in pursuit of her towards Paris, imagining that to be the only road she could have taken; and after, not knowing what to do, she had CARDINI arrested and searched, and though he was confined in a dungeon, yet his fidelity was fuch that he would not make the least discovery to the prejudice of Julia. " The earl of BEDFORD will " foon arrive," faid the abbefs, to her confident, " what answer can I make him when he asks for " his lady? will he not have great reason to com-" plain of my negligence, in taking so little care of " fuch a precious deposit." She then began to weep most bitterly, when one of her favourites thought on an expedient which would at least delay for fome time the earl of BEDFORD, as well as fave her from those reproaches which she dreaded, " I would advise you, madam;" said the confidant, " to write him word immediately, that " JULIA has been feized with a most violent fe-" ver, which carried her off in a few days; that. " the utmost care was taken of her, and that you " had her interred in a manner suitable to her " quality. That as she gave all her jewels to her " woman before her death, you had nothing to " fend him of what she brought to the abby." The abbess approved very much of the advice; without reflecting on the consequence, having had so small a share of sense as to be entirely governed by the young nun; who had given her this advice. She wrote as had been agreed on, nor did the unfortunate CARDINI recover his liberty the fooner, but was kept a long time in prison, without being permitted either to justify himself, or let his friends know in what a deplorable fituation he was in.

MEAN while JULIA arrived without the least accident at Florence, but not thinking it proper to go immediately to LUCILLA's without preparing her for her reception; besides, she wanted to consult with her in what manner she should make her appearance; she therefore wrote to her by ISABELLA, and it is impossible to express how greatly Lucilla was overjoyed at her being fo near, and so great was her impatience, that she accompanied ISABELLA that moment to her friend's lodgings. They embraced each other a thousand times, and it was agreed that JULIA should pass for a widow relation of LUCILLA, who came to pass some time with her. She went by the name of Howard, one of the most illustrious families in England, and so numerous that it would be difficult to discover her. She dreffed herself in the habit of a widow, as if she had really been in mourning for her husband; and the reason that was given for her coming to Italy was, because she could not bear to live in a place where she had fustained fuch a great loss.

her

It is remarkable that while she seemed to mourn for the supposed death of her lord, he was in reality in mourning for her, as the letter which the abbess wrote, came just in time to prevent his setting out. At first he was much grieved for the loss of a wife he so greatly loved, but the time he had passed without seeing her, and the cause he imagined he had of being displeased at her conduct,

duct, joined to the natural inconftancy of man, made him foon forget her, and entirely chased all rememberance of her from his thoughts; every one in London were informed of her death; the countess of Douglas and lord Sussex were greatly afflicted, and the earl of WARWICK who arrived foon after the fatal news, was inconfolable. " Am " I not, " faid he to his friends, " greatly to be " pitied? after having endured fuch a painful " captivity, and been so long absent from my " country, to be acquainted at my arrival, with " the lofs of an only daughter, in whose praise " every one are fo lavish, and whom I fo tenderly " loved, though a stranger to her perfections! " A daughter with whose hand I promised to re-" ward the man to whom I owe the greatest obli-" gations in the world, and who is diffracted at " the ill treatment she has received from her " cruel lord."

THE earl of BEDFORD acquainted his lordship by some of his friends, that he would be glad to have the pleasure of seeing him; but was refused with contempt, as the earl of WARWICK looked on him as the cause of his daughters death. Affairs were in this situation when HYPOLITUS arrived arrived in London. The reason that retarded him fo long was, an accident that happened to him as he rid post from Paris to Calais, to make the greater expedition, but unluckily the horse on which he rode fell under him, and in endeavouring to difengage himself from the stirrups, he sprained his ancle, which gave him fuch great pain, that he could scarce gain a neighbouring village, with the affiftance of his footman (his other fervants having taken another road) where he had the misfortune to meet with an ignorant furgeon, who after making him fuffer the most violent pain, put him into a worse condition than he was before, which threw him into a fever, and it was three months before he could continue his journey. that feere ever live down, and

11

DURING his confinement he would not write to JULIA for fear of alarming her, but this precaution which he took to prevent her uneafines only served to make her the more so; and he also dearly paid for the inquietudes he had innocently caused her, when at his arrival in London he was informed of the death of his father and mistress. He could not possibly doubt the certainty of her decease, as the abbess of St. Menoux's letter happened to be in the hands of the counters his mother, which she shewed him to endeavour to cure him of a passion which had been the cause of all his misfortunes : he had been long enough at St. Menoux to be acquainted with the abbels's writing, therefore the fight of her letter convinced him of the death of Julia, and utterly extinguished all his hopes of the letter's being a counterfeit. It would be impossible to express his grief and despair, all his other misfortunes were trifles when compared with this; even her marriage, her being carried off, and her absence. were nothing to it; he would fee no company but the earls of WARWICK and SUSSEX, and Scarce ever fpake. The counters his mother was obliged. to use her authority to make him take some nourishment; he enjoyed so small a share of repose that he scarce ever lay down, and he fell all at once into fuch a dejection of spirits, that they feared it would have put an end to his life.

0.30

He acquainted lord Syssex with his intention of egain challenging the earl of Benroup, which was the only thing that could give him new life, and requested his friend to let his lordship know, he would be glad to have the satisfaction of once more meeting him, and by that means determine a quarrel, which could not end but with the life of one or the other. His friend endeavoured to diffuade him from it, by faying this was no time to hazard his life, as he was fo excessively weak, he could scarce stand; but he replied, that he was a better judge of his own ftrength, besides, his resentment would lend him as much as was necessary, and that the worst which could happen was his being killed. His friend having in vain endeavoured to persuade him from his defign, went to the earl of BEDFORD, and after much conversation found him very irresolute as to the answer he should fend; it was not very long fince he was recovered from the wounds he received from HYPOLITUS at Calais, to whose courage he was no stranger, and knew perfectly well the motives which urged him to make this demand. He at last told lord Sussex. that he would readily give HYPOLITUS the fatisfaction he defired, but that her majesty had ftrictly forbid duels; that it must therefore appear as an accidentel meeting, and as foon as Hy-POLITUS and he met, they would decide their quarrel.

prevent her presidingly and received

WHILE the earl of Sussex carried this answer to Hypolitus, the earl of Bedford immediately

B 2 fettled

^{*} MARY I.

fettled his affairs, and fet out on his travels. Hypolitus, fought him every where, and it was fome time before he discovered his departure, which greatly vexed him, as he flattered himself with the hopes of having full satisfacton for his adorable Julia, but as every object he saw daily reminded him of his irretrievable loss, and recalled her idea to his memory, he resolved to leave England, and go seek in foreign lands a glorious death.

THE earl of WARWICK finding him absolutely determined to go, defired he would accompany him to Malta, where he intended going with the grand protector of Mountferrat, who had been fome time in Eng'and, and by means of cardinal Pole, had obtained from her majefty the restitution of the estates belonging to the Order of Malta, Hypolitus was greatly pleased at the thoughts of fignilazing himself, and of sharing the fortunes of his lordship who was reverenced for his great and good qualities. The earl of Sussex having some particular reasons for leaving England, refolved to accompany them. Queen Maky would not permit the marchioness of Non-THAMPTON to return to court, notwithstanding all all the entreaties of lord Sussex and his friends. but continued persecuting the memory of the unhappy marquis in the person of his lovely confort; and her majesty being informed that lord Sussex was in love with her, and wished to celebrate the nuptials, she did all in her power to prevent it; telling him she would be glad if his lordship would marry the daughter of the lord viscount Monta-GUE, whom she had sent ambassador to Rome, with the bishop of ELY, and who at his departure, left his daughter in her majesty's care; and as the had a great regard for the earl of Sussex, on account of his merit, she thought she could not procure him a more advantageous match, but as he would not facrifice his love to his fortune, he chose rather to absent himself till her majesty should change her sentiments; and the thoughts of accompanying his friend gave him great pleafure. They foon made the necessary preparations for their departure, but Hypolitus did not shule his mother, should be informed of the intended journey, as he rightly judged her maternal fondness would oppose his designs; he therefore kept it a profound fecret, which was not difficult, as he was now his own mafter. He fet out with the earls of WARWICK and Sussex, every country being alike to him, as he never expected to enjoy happiness in this life. At their arrival in Malta, they found every one in great grief for the loss of four gallies, and other veffels, which were funk in the harbour, by a whirlwind; and it was dreadful to think on the number of knights as well as flaves who perished on board the gallies. Soon after this accident, prince FRANCIS of LORRAIN, came to Malta, with two gallies, decorated in a most magnificent manner; this prince, like all those of his family, was extremely well made, liberal, gallant, brave, and magnificent. The general of the Va-LETTA refigned his command to the prince; and HYPOLITUS, with the earls of WARWICK and Sussex, were by the grand master of Malta prefented to the prince, to whom they offered their fervice. His highness received them on board his galley (he being admiral) with all the marks of goodness and distinction, which they had reason to expect, both from their own merit, and the prince's discernment. There were three gallies besides the admiral's, and they failed for the coast of Barbary, to feek DRAGUT RAIS, with defign to engage him, but meeting with a brigantine near Tripoly which they took, Assan Bahi who commanded her, acquaimed them, that DRAGUT RAIS would not put to sea this year, because he was endeavouring to make himself master of Tripoly; this obliged them to seek elsewhere an opportunity to signalize themselves, but we must now leave them, to relate what passed elsewhere.

THE abbess of St. Menoux, finding by the earl of BEDFORD's answer to her letter, that his lordship was really convinced of his lady's death, and that he would not come to France, thought it useless to keep the painter any longer in prison, especially as he would not make any confession, his perseverance therefore at last gained him his liberty, and as foon as he was discharged, he immediately fet out for England, according to the promife he made Julia; and on his arrival at London, enquired for Hypolitus, and the earls of WAR-WICK and Sussex, but was told they had not appeared at court for some time, and though he used the utmost diligence in enquiring at what place it was probable to find them, yet his trouble was entirely useless. He enquired concerning the earl of BEDFORD and was told that fince the death of his lady he came but feldom abroad. CARDINI was greatly grieved at the death of a lady, so good and generous, and imagined that the trouble trouble she was in, added to the fatigue of her journey, had been the cause of her death; and having no other business in London he returned to Paris. Thus Julia impatiently expected news without the least prospect of receiving any, as all those from whom she wished to hear imagined her dead.

SHE lodged with LUCILLA, and not caring to fee much company, passed for a widow, who chose to live very retired. Her sorrow for her father, and her dear HYPOLITUS, gave her an air of languor that encreased all her charms. "Will "you, madam, for ever continue to lament the dead?" said the senator Albert's to her, and will you not have some pity for those whom "your charms have killed?" In speaking these mards, he looked on her in such a tender manner, that to avoid meeting his eyes she cast down her's. "Leave me to my griefs, my lord," replied she, with an air of sadness, "I find a secret "pleasure in indulging my afflictions.

THE senator ALBERTI was yet young enough to be in love, was extremely well made, and very gallant, but was quite obstinate in his opinions, 25

d

0

73

H

T

0

0

r

H

e

۲,

n

,

n

t

and had often thought of marrying again, had not his love for his fon, and the prejudice it might do him, prevented him. Indeed Julia appeard fo lovely, so discreet, and wise, that he became in love with her almost at first sight; his assiduities embarrassed her greatly, and made her sometimes determine to behave to him in such a manner as to leave him no room to flatter himself with the least hopes; and frequetly in a ludicrous manner, described the folly of those, who at a certain age, fancy themselves still agreeable.

SHE continued to rally him, but in spight of the despair which her indifference caused him, it was not in his power to tear from his heart the satal shaft with which it was pierced.

JULIA did not at first ressect on her danger, till she found herself obliged to endeavour to damp the progress of a passion of which she was the involuntary cause, but it was then too late, for the senator was so transported with the violence of his love, that he declared he must marry her or die. She endeavoured to convince him of the injustice of this alliance, in regard to signior Leander; that all her friends would be displeased, and that she was resolved to pass the rest of her days in widowhood widowhood: all these reasons vexed, but did not convince him; he told her she should be her own mistress; that he was resolved to disinherit his son since she made that an obstacle to oppose his felicity, following this declaration, with so many threatenings as convinced her that his passion had entirely got the better of his senses, and that she had every thing to sear from its consequences.

As foon as he quitted her, she went to Lucit-LA's apartment, with eyes swimming in tears, " Ah! my dear fifter," faid she, " you know not " as yet all my misfortunes; your step-father has " almost distracted me; you and I have fre-" quently jested at the thoughts of his new passi-" on, but it is now too true, that it will oblige " me at last to leave you; he will have me marry " him, and speaks as a tyrant would to his most " abject flave. His great power in this city flatters him, therefore it is time for me to depart, " least he should endeavour to detain me; judge " then, my dear friend, what an addition this is " to my misfortunes; befides I have not heard " from my father or HYPOLITUS these fourteen " months that I have been with you, all that we " can can learn is, that they are not in London, where " then can they be? Just heaven! is it possible " that after the meffage I fent them from St. Me-" noux, by CARDINI, that they could have aban-" dened me? What have I not to fear for their " fafety, as well as from my lord's ill nature? and " yet more from the violence of the fenator's paffi-" on." Her grief was too great for utterance, and the burft into tears." Ceafe my dear Julia," faid LUCILLA, " and do not thus give way to affliction, " your misfortunes, thank heaven, are not fo great " as to be without a remedy; and I am convinced " that some particular reasons which we cannot " at present foresee, has cansed the absence of " the earl of WARWICE, and my brother. My " mother, who at prefent is not acquainted " with the reason, may yet at last discover, " and perhaps foon let us know it. I even " flatter myself with the pleasure of seeing them " here, which will at once end all our troubles. " As to your lord, you need not fear him, while " you remain with me; and as to your violent lo-" ver, who intends to be your's in fpight of your-" felf, we must acquaint him with the innumer-" able obstacles that oppose his happines, which " will at once put an end to all his proceedings." "You are mistaken, my dear sister, interrupted JULIA, " the fenator will not believe what we " fav. but will imagine it to be a tale invented on " purpose to prevent his desires, but the furest " way to avoid him will be for me to retire with " fecrecy to a monastry, that he might not be able " to discover where I am." This expedient appeared to LUCILLA as the best, and taking her coach, went to a monastry where she was well known; but the enamoured fenator, dreaded the loss of his miftress, and fearing by what she told him, that she might take measures contrary to his love, watched all her motions as well as Lucilla's. and he went fo far as to bribe one of her women in whom she confided, by whose means he was informed that JULIA would in a few days retire to a convent. White the Tol Stock ME

" will

This news feemed so dreadful to the senator, that he was ready to die, as he saw plainly that she had a great aversion for him, since she chose rather to go to a nunnery than to marry him, and he endeavoured to overcome a passion that had caused him such torments; but in vain did he summon his virtue, his reason, and even his resent-

ment

ment to his aid, they all abandoned him to the tyrannic power of the most cruel and violent of all passions, and the thought of losing her, rekindled those slames with such redoubled violence that he resolved to make use of every possible means to effect his intention.

HE foon found means to execute his defign without the leaft difficulty. JULIA had an apartment below, that looked into the garden, to which was a large glass door, by which one might easily enter; there was no person in that part of the house but herself, and ISABBLLA, who lay in a press bed, but that night had been detained with the other fervants, by the defign of her whom he had engaged in his interest; and Isabell's knowing her lady generally fat up late, it made her the more ready to flay. The garden door was opened to admit the fresh air into her closet while the wrote a letter to her dear HypoLitus, for though the did not know where to fend it, yet the fcarce ever passed a day without writing to him, with intention to fend them all together, as foon as fhe had his address. What she was now writing is as follows a vords selding si an such a recom

[&]quot;Ar a time when every one are enjoying their C c

"to ease my mind, by acquainting you with my grief, which alas! is very great. Ignorant as I am of your fate, and though I have no reafon to suspect your constancy, yet I find, that repeated affurances of your fidelity are very nescellary towards the preservation of my life, a life I should soon loath, if I thought it no longer dear to you, which is the only thing can render it supportable, and since the senator Alberts.

" has declared his passion to me, I-

Just as she had written thus far she perceived three men in masks enter her chamber, while a fourth more carefully disguised than the others, endeavoured to stop her mouth with a handkerchief; they carried her off in spite of her cries, and the great resistance she made, and crossed the garden in great haste. It was very late and the night excessive dark, nor had any one in the house the least notion of what was doing. Julia was conveyed to a coach, which immediately drove with great speed through the Gate of the Cross, towards Sienna, but as it passed through bye ways which were mountainous and rugged, the coachman drove against a rock which broke the coach day day foon began to appear, and one of those who conducted JULIA and seemed to be the master, seeing the coach could not proceed, mounted his horfe, and commanded them to place her before him; but she made a greater relistance than could be expected from one of her fex. " No," cried she, " barbarian! you shall not tear me from hence, " till you have first taken my life! you violate " the laws of hospitality, by forcing me thus a-" gainst my will from your own house, where I " imagined I had found an afylum." She continued her struggles, but her strength soon failing, they had almost overpowered her when they percevied eight horfemen, well armed galloping towards them at full speed, and on their approach JULIA foon perceived the fenator ALBERTI at their head, and they immediately attaked the affailants, who let her go in order to defend themselves

WHILE they began a most furious combat, she took advantage of her being set at liberty to endeavour an escape, and descending by a path which she perceived in the mountain, walked for some time with sear and great difficulty, but though she judged by the continual report of their fire arms, that her enemies were too much employed to think of her escape, yet she feared some of them would purfue her. " I have every thing to fear," faid fhe to herfelf, " both from those who carried me off. " and them that rescued me ; but who the former are I cannot imagine. I thought at first it " was the fenator, but it is to him that I owe my " escape." In this manner did she continue her reflections; and being greatly fatigued with the road, which was very uneven, and full of froncs. besides the least noise terrified her so as to make her creep among bushes and briars, to conceal herfelf, by which her face was all scratched, her hair fell in diffievelled locks about her neck, and part of her cloaths were torn; in short she was in a pitiable condition, not knowing where to direct her steps; she cast her eyes every way, and at last perceived by the fide of the mountain, a shepherd's cottage, to which place she went as fast as her fatigued limbs would permit. Pain i natad and sam Willia

SHE found therein a woman at work, who seeing the condition she was in, and the extreme melancholy which appeared in her countenance, can towards her, and received her with the greatest marks of tenderness and respect, which did not fail to comfort in some measure the sair JULIA, "If you will do me a kindness," said she to this poor woman, "put me in some place where I may "be concealed, as I am consident I shall be sought for here, and you may be assured of a suitable "reward." The shepherdess immediately made her go up to a garret which was full of sodder for sheep, and having put her into a place where it was impossible to find her, she returned to her work. Soon after, two gentlemen on horseback called at the cottage, and asked several questions concerning Julia, and even threatened her if she did not discover where she was, but she denied it with so much unconcern and simplicity, that they immediately departed and took another road.

As foon as they were gone, she went to visit her lovely guest whom she found almost dead with sear, having heard the voice of the senator Albert; but the shepherdess assuring her of their departure, desired her to take courage, and brought her some cream and bread, and assisted her with great tenderness in cleaning herself. Julia did not think it safe to venture out immediately, but thought it better to remain where she was a few days, not knowing what to resolve on. She was in great dread of the senator, but she feared much more:

Cc2

more her unknown enemy who remained masked, even after he had carried her off; she thought she might easily secure herself from the senator, but her ignorance of the other gave her great uneasiness, "for while he is thus unknown," said she, "I "shall be ever in dread of falling into the hands "I ought to avoid."

ALL those different reflections threw her into an uneafiness which encreased her lowness of spirits. The shepherdes's husband returned at night, to whom his wife told of having a lady concealed in her house; he was an old labourer of some fense, and judging by the great beauty of his vifitor, as well as by her drefs, that she was a perfon of quality, was greatly moved at her affliction. She asked him if he had not met with some gentlemen that morning? He replied, that he had feen feveral; fome of whom were marked, and feemed to be wounded, and went off at full speed; that one of them stopped to ask him if he had not met a young lady, and having answered him in the negative, he followed his companions. JULIA who did not doubt but they were feeking her, passed a very disagreeable night. She had by good luck her purse with her, and some jewels, as she was not undreffed undressed when she was carried off: she gave money to her entertainers, in order to engage them in her interest, and weeping most bitterly, "You " fee my condition," faid she, " that I must leave " this place to feek another, where I can be more " fecure, advise me therefore, how I shall con-" trive to disguise myself, as my thoughts are in " fuch confusion that I cannot at present resolve " on any." " I would advise you, madam," said the. shepherdess, " to disguise yourself in a suit " of my cloaths." She approved of this scheme, and immediately put them on, but appeared fo lovely, notwithstanding all she could do, that the labourer and his wife told her she might easily be known for a person of quality; at last after having confidered sometime, the labourer advised her to difguise her fex, and put on the habit of a pilgrim. that being tall she might very well pass for a youth. She refolved to follow his advice, and defired him to go to Sienna, to procure for her every thing befitting her new difguise, but while he is executing his commission, let us return for a moment to Florence.

THAT same night in which Julia was carried off, by those unknown persons, the senator Al-

BERTI

BERTI was determined to carry her off himself, and by that means become mafter of her person; fince he could not be owner of her heart. Is a-BELLA, as was before remarked, remained longer than usual with the servants, but fearing that her lady would fit up till she returned, entered her apartment almost the instant she was forced from it, and feeing her veil torn, it having droped from her in the scuffle, and the chairs and tables overturned with the candles on the floor, and not find ing her lady, she doubted not but some new misfortune had happened to her; and began to weep. in fuch a manner that furprifed every one, particularly the fenator, who entered that moment in. order to seize Julia; but when he understood. the was not to be found, he was inflamed with rage, and imagining she had been run away with, having all his people in readiness, he soon set pursuit of the affailants having been informed by the person who kept the Gate of the Cross that: he had been bribed to keep it open, under pretence that some company were to pass soon after midnight in a coach and fix, to avoid the heat of the The fenator accompanied by fignior LEAN-DER, who had rifen at the first alarm, pursued

and:

and foon overtook them as has been already related, but the combat did not hold long on account of the inequality of numbers; as ALBERTI's party were more numerous than the others, whose leader being wounded fled towards the mountains, followed by all his companions except one, that was desperatately wounded and lay bleeding on the place of action. LEANDER obferving him in that fituation approached him, and taking off his malk did all in his power to make him confess who had employed him in this affair; but all he could learn was that he supposed his mafter was in love with JULIA, whom he refolved to carry off in a few days; but being informed by one of the senator ALBERTI's fervants (whom he bribed to let him into the house) that the senator intended to cary her off that same night he refolved to be the first LEANDER demanded the name of his mafter, but he would not answer any more questions, faying in a weak and scarce articulate voice, "Consider, my lord, I am at the point " of death, leave me therefore a few moments " to fettle my conscience," and soon after expired.

THE senator ALBERTI returned to Florence, in an agony of despair, and shutting himself in his chamber, chamber, took from his pocket a paper which he remembered to have found in Julia's closet that seemed to have been written by herself,, and having perused it, had the additional grief of knowing: that her affections were engaged. "I flattered my-" felf," cried he, " that all mankind were at leaft " indifferent to her; but alas ! how greatly am L " mistaken, her profound melanche'y was only " occasioned by her absence from her lover, and " the disdain with which she treated me, were so " many facrifices which she made to him." He next began to reflect who this HYPOLITUS could be, whom she mentioned in her letter, and soon calling to mind LUCILLA's brother, he went immediately to her chamber. " Ease my tortured " mind," faid he to her, "you have a brother " with whom I am acquainted, is it he that is in " love with the fair English woman we have just " loft? tell me, I conjure you without disguise." LUCILLA was confidering for fome time what answer she should make, but the senator perceiving. there was some mystery in her appearing confused; preffed her in fuch a manner, that she could no longer refuse acquainting him with the entire hiftory of JULIA, but he was fo-fur prifed and afflicted at having perfecuted her with his love, that he was feized with the most lively grief. " How many " painful hours, faid he to LUCILLA, would you " have spared me if you had thought me worthy of " your confidence; you were no stranger to the " commencement of my passion, and though ac-" quainted with the little fuccess I had to hope " for, yet you did not endeavour to stop the " course of a torrent which at last has brought " me to the brink of a precipice." He added fome bitter reproaches to these words, and being tortured with love, anger, jealoufy, and despair, he quitted her chamber, scarce able to support himself; and was immediately seized with a burning fever, which reduced him fo low that he died in a few days, tenderly regretted by his illustrious fon and all-his friends.

WHILE they were lamenting the death of the fenator ALBERTI, the unfortunate JULIA quitted the cottage, disguised in the habit of a pilgrim, after having recompenced her entertainers in the best manner she could, charging the labourer to convey a letter to LUCILLA, in which she acquainted her with the sad adventure which had happened, and that she was going to travel. She took the road to Bologna with intention of going to Rome and and Venice, as she imagined she may chance to meet her father, or at least some of his friends, who might for his sake get her to be received in a convent, where she intended to remain till she could once more appear in the world.

SHE could not without horror reflect on the manner of her being carried off, and after a variety of reflections, imagined it was the young marquis of STROZZI, one of the most illustrious families of Florence: he was just returned from his travels, and having seen Julia, was struck with admiration at her charms. He had great merit, was very brave and enterprising, and being a Florentine by birth, had less to fear from the consequences of carrying off a stranger, who had no friends to resent such an outrage. This made her imagine that it was the marquis who had been the second of that adventure.

SHE appeared so lovely in her pilgrim's habit, that she could not be too careful of concealing herself, to avoid the curiosity of those who saw her, she had cut her hair, as it was wore by men, which fell in large curls on her shoulders; the great heat of the sun did not in the least injure her complexion. She made but small stages, as delicacy of her feet would not permit her to walk long without being much fatigued. She had already passed Fierosola, on the way to Bologna, when finding herfelf in a most enchanting wood of orange and granate trees; the fun began to decline, and she being fatigued, was invited to take fome repose by the sweet murmuring of a stream which glided flowly on, whose borders being covered with foft grass, seemed very agreeable to one in her fituation, and fitting on a bank of turf, reclined her head against a tree, which served her for a pillow, and having covered her face with her large hat fell infentibly into a profound fleep; but fhe was woke on a fudden by an accident which pained and very much furprised her, having felt her leg pierced with an arrow, and foon after heard a noise of horns, dogs and hunters, she cried out in a plaintive tone, and was endeavouring to pull out the arrow which gave her great pain, when she perceived three ladies on horseback, so lovely, of fuch good mein, and dreffed in fo elegant a manner, as caused her for a moment to forget her wound; one of them carried a bow at her girdle. and a quiver full of arrrows at her back, who might very well have passed for DIANNA in the midft of her nymph's.

This lovely person shewed great concern at feeing the young pilgrim's wound, finding it was herfelf that had caused it, having let fly an arrow a moment before. "By what fatality," faid she, "did " I wound you, when I only intended to shew my " dexterity to those ladies; we are both very un-"Your compassion," replied Ju-" fortunate." DIA in a languishing manner, " is alone suffici-" ent to alleviate my pain." "I know not," returned the fair huntress, " if it is any confola-"tion to you, I must own that your presence " gives me pleasure; and that I may begin to re-" pair my innocent crime, I request you will have " the goodness to come to my house, where you " shall remain till you are perfectly cured." then commanded one of her attendants to bind up the pilgrim's wound place him in the chariot, and conduct him to her castle. JULIA unable to supberfelf, confented to this proposal, and thanked her ladyship for her generosity. One of her gentlemen, accompanied Julia in the chariot, and amongst other discourse, told her that his lady was but just married; that she was a daughter of the family of BECARELLI, one of the most considerable in Bologna; that her father having no other child but herfelf, was greatly displeased at the

the thoughts of his name being extinct, which made him resolve to chuse a son-in-law, that would take his name, and bear his arms, to whom he gave an immense fortune with his daughter, who was a lady of great merit; that her lord. now called the marquis of BECARELLI, had been absent for some time, that the ladies who accompanied her, were her relations. He then demanded of Julia to what place she was going. " You " feem fo much above your appearance," added he, " that though I do not know you, I am per-"I funded you are a person of quality." "I know " not almost what I am," replied Julia, fighing, " but to fatisfy your curiofity, " my name is SIL-" vio, and I am going to Loretto; my fortune " having placed me in fuch a fituation as not to " be in danger of want" "You have faid a great " deal, in few words;" returned the gentleman, " but yet I cannot imagine, how a person of your " appearance can be so melancholy." While they converfed in this manner, they arrived at the coftle, and the stranger was conducted into a most magnificent apartment.

THE marchioness had a footman who was an expert surgeon, and who dressed Sirvio's wound,

(fo we must call Julia for some time) the arrow having penetrated very deep; but there was no. danger from its consequence. As soon as the marchioness returned, she went to the pilgrim's chamber, accompanied by her relations, (being convinced by the account her gentleman had given her of the conversation in the chariot, that he must be a person of merit) and though she remained with him but a short time, his image remained so strongly impressed in her heart, that it prevented her taking any repose; and under pretence of great hofpitality, went next day to vifit SILVIO. "are you better?" faid she to him, " and have you forgiven " me for the pain I have caused you?" "Ah ma-" dam," faid he, " how little do you know my " thoughts, if you imagine I am concerned at this " trifling wound, which I regard as a happiness " in having received from your fair hand." The marchionels feemed not to take notice of those gallant expressions, but they penetrated to her foul, believing at the fame time that she had made as deep an impression in his. She had a waiting-maid in whom she greatly confided: " EUGENIA," faid she, "hast thou ever seen any thing so lovely st as the young Silvio? and didft thou remark with what an eye he regards me the love I " read

" read in them, and the pain he has caused in my heart alarms me so, that I have resolved to see him no more." She kept to this resolution for several days, having seigned herself sick, that her servants might not perceive this change; but though she did not see him, his image was ever present to her imagination.

SHE became melancholy and thoughtful, which greatly furpifed and chagrined the marquis of Br-CARELLI her father, who came frequently to fee her. She could not long continue in her resolution; for a few days after, as the paffed by Silvio's chamber, she went in to fee him, but found him in bed, and perceiving by the redness of his eyes, that he had been weeping, the imagined it was the effect of his grief for her absence; thus she gained no advantage by her not visiting him, but on the contrary absolutely lost her heart. " What is the mat-" ter Silvio," faid she, " you feem overwhelmed " with fadness?" " Madam," replied he, " I am " not yet accustomed to my misfortunes, and they " become new to me every day." "But," returned the marchioness, " are you fure that you are not " ingenious in tormenting yourfelf?" " No ma-" dam," replied he, " I do not love to create imaginary ginary troubles nor do I endeavour to flatter " myfelf." They foon after fell into a profound meditation. The marchioness being occupied with her passion, was convinced that the supposed SILvio loved her; as to Silvio he took no notice of the air of languor and fighs that frequently efcaped the young marchioness, being entirely taken up with thinking on her dear Hypolitus.

THE marchioness soon after retired in confufion, being now convinced how infinitely dear SILvio was to her, which caused her much disquiet, " Ah! fatal arrow," cried she, in an agony of grief, " the wound which thou hast made will be " healed sooner than that which the lovely un-" known had made in my heart,"

IT was some days before, the marchioness returned to Silvio's chamber, and as he was now almost able to walk, he thought it was his duty to pay his respects to her. He observed that she frequently changed colour while he spoke to her, and feared she was ill, yet out of respect did not dare alk her. She made him fit near her, and having looked on him for fome time, " You will foon " be in a condition to leave us, SILVIO," faid she, " but will you not have the goodness to acquaint me me before your departure with the name of the " person I have wounded, and for whom I have " had fuch disquietudes." " Madam," faid he, "I " am an unfortunate wretch that do not deferve " fuch an obliging curiofity as your ladyship's; my " birth and fortune are equally limitted, you fee " my condition, I am no other than that what I " feem." " If you are really what I take you for," replied the marchiones, "I do not know a more " accomplished person, and since you have rea-" fon to conceal your quality, at least let me know " if you are in love; it is a question you may ea-" fily answer without discovering yourself, and if " you have any regard for me, you will answer " me with truth." The thoughts which this question brought to the rememberance of SILVIO, caused him to figh profoundly. "Yes, madam," faid he with an air of tenderness, "I own I love " without hope, and am destined to be for ever " the most unfortunate of men." These words having confirmed the marchioness in her opinion of his being in love, the cast down her eyes without making any answer. "When will you depart SiL-" vio?" faid she, after a short silence, " and will " you when you are gone think fometimes of me. ?" " I shall sooner forget myself, madam," replied he " and

" and the goodness you have shewn me, will ne" ver be essaced from my heart." Fearing a longer visit might incommode her, he retired to his apartment.

" Am I then going to lose you, lovely Silvio," cried she, as soon as she saw herself at liberty to complain, " You are on the point of going, " and yet appearances have deceived me; or if you " love me, why do you not feek to prolong your " ftay? but the reason is, because you cannot be-" lieve that I am so weak as to love you, and are " therefore fearful of a too deep impression. But " fly me! charming SILVIO, fly me,-I confent " to it : your presence only serves to encrease my " torments, and perhaps absence may cure my " passion." Here the was filent, and the tears which she could not stop, prevented her from leaving the closet. SILVIO did not visit her the next day, and feveral days past without his feeking any opportunity to speak with her; but finding himself able to depart, he went to her, telling her he was come to take his leave, and thank her for the fayours with which she had loaded him. The marchioness found it very difficult to conceal the emotion which this cruel separation caused her," "Go " SILVIO,

"SILVIO," said she, "go, accomplish your vows; and be assured I shall for ever pray for your happiness." He informed her he would set out early next morning, and after some moments conversation he quitted her.

THE night was fo excessive hot that he did not undress, but threw himself on his bed, endeavouring to find some repose, to enable him to begin his journey; but the young marchioness who could not refolve to let him depart without feeing and bidding him adieu, went out of her apartment without making any noise; the moon being very bright she took no candle, besides she reslected that if the violence of her passion would occasion her to use any tender expressions towards him, she would be the less ashamed. She resolved to give him her picture, to prevent him from forgetting her, SiLvio reposed himself on a pavilion bed, his great beauty put the marchioness in mind of that of Cu-PID whom the curious PSYCHE desired to fee, "ah ! " SILVIO," faid she looking on him with an air of tenderness, " if I had really made any impressions of " love in thy foul, thou wouldst not thus, at the " eve of thy departure, be buried in such a pro-" found fleep! Is it possible that while you are " preparing

0

" preparing for me such a sea of troubles, thou art not in the least moved." As she dared not wake him, she placed herself gently down by him, the moon being so bright as to give her a full view of his charms. " Who in this world can refemble " thee," faid she, in a low voice, mixed with admiration, " who can express thy beauties or be "infentible to thy perfections?" Thus did she drink by large draughts the poison which the fight of fo many charms infenfibly glided to her foul; fhe put her picture into his pocket, imagining that he would be agreeably furprifed at finding fo valuable a present. Being at last entirely overcome with the violence of her passion, she could no longer for-Bear putting her lips close to his, and embraced him with transports. It was sometime before the could quit him, but what was her condition on receiving a blow of a poignard from her hufband, the marquis of BECARELLI, and he quitted her cally to punish Sirvio; who being woke by the noise, and rising in haste, was greatly terrified at his danger, and endeavouring to escape, this furious hulband gave him a blow with the fame poignard, which pierced his arm, and he was going to redouble his violence, had he not being held by two gentlemen, confidents in the plot, who reminded him of the design he had formed, telling him it would be impossible to execute it if he killed this young man. They therefore conveyed Silvio to a tower, where he was closely guarded.

foon

THE unfortunate marchioness remained in a fit, drowned in her blood; her lord caused her to be removed and confined to her apartment. It would be difficult to describe her fituation, but she was less concerned for herself than for him she loved. fearing her lord had facrificed this innocent victim, to his jealoufy; but though she had a great curiofity to know what was become of him, the dared not ask, dreading the natural violence of his lordship's temper; and because she could not confide in any person, being surrounded by servants who were spies on her actions, and by whom she feared to be betrayed, as the really had been by EUGENIA, in whom the placed to much confidence. The marquis of BECARELLI before he fet out on his journey gained her to his interest; which is not very difficult, where a person is liberal. He commanded this girl to write him an exact account of her lady's behaviour in his absence; and she wrote him all the her lady told her concerning Silvio. The marquis mansported with rage, returned as foon as possible, and came in private to his house; EUGENIA contrived his concealment, and he waited two days for an opportunity of surprising his lady with her gallant.

HE at first resolved to shut her up in a convent during the remainder of her life, to obtain a confiscation of her estate, and to prosecute SILVIO for criminal correspondence with his lady; but unable to restrain his fury at seeing her seated on the stranger's bed, he in the first emotion of his anger wounded them both. Mean while Julia was confined to a tower, in fuch a pitiable condition as would have melted the most obdurate heart. At irst she thought to discover her sex, imagining that to be the furest way to justify the marchioness, as also to obtain her own liberty; and she was just on the point of telling her keeper that she defired to speak with the marquis, but reflecting that perhaps the intended, as the means of extricating herfelf, might perhaps be the occasion of losing her life; because the enraged marquis on finding his lady not guilty, and fearing the refentment of her family, might perhaps carry things to the last extremity, and cause Julia to be poisoned, to prevent her appearing in the marchiones's justification, which which made her think it better to trust herself in the hands of justice, who would at least preserve her from the power of her enemies,

SHE passed a most dreadful night; her keepers having searched her pockets found the marchioness's picture, which was a strong proof against them both. JULIA was extreamly surprised at the picture being found in her pocket, nor could she imagine how it had been conveyed there. Next morning she was put into a coach and carried to the prifon of Bologna, under a strong guard.

SHE wept bitterly during the journey, which caused her to be insulted by those who conducted her, as they took her for a weak and cowardly man. The marchioness was also conveyed to Bologna, and notwithstanding her wound, she would have been confined in the public prison, if her father who was one of the most powerful men in the city, had not obtained an order to have her confined in the Castle.

Such an extraordinary adventure happening to perfons of so distinguished a rank, made a great noise in the city, each family having their partigans; but what served to persuade people of the truth of what the marquis alledged against his lady was, the great charms of SILVIO. Several ladies who had the curiofity to go fee him in prison lost their hearts, nor were they less captivated than the fair marchioness. But though she was believed, guilty of the crime of which she was accused by her lord, yet the great credit of her father biaffed people much in her favour. This news gave him fome trouble, as it all rested on his defending what he had so passionately and with so little prudence began. In this embarrassment, he thought of an expedient, that might disconcert his wife's party, which was to petition, that the judges might not be all Italians, (as SILVIO was a foreigner) but that they may be divided, as the law permitted; which was frequently the custom at Bologna; and the count BENTIVOGLIO, the governor, took on himself the care of finding persons of honour and integrity, both parties being alike to him.

truth

The whole city was in eager expectation to hear the sentence which was to be given; the governor desired it might be tried at the Castle, where the marchioness was confined. The affembly was so numerous as had not been seen for some time. The fair marchioness appeared in mourning, mourning, as being suitable to her misfortune; her wound as well as her grief caused her to look very pale, though not less charming on that account : her father, venerable by his age, and good mein, led her into court, and the rest of her family accompanied her, SILVIO was brought in at another door, loaded with chains, but all who faw him pitied him fincerely. They both threw themfelves at the feet of their judges, their eyes bathed in tears, and fighing profoundly. " My lord's," faid the marchioness, " I implore your justice as " well as your pity. I am unfortunate, without being guilty, and heaven is witness to my inno-" cence and he that has accused me with so much " violence and fo little regard to my reputation " has at best but ill grounded suspicions."

SILVIO as yet remained filent. The marquis of BECARELLI came forward, with the gentlement who were witness to his lady's being in SILVIO's apartment, and holding the picture which had been found in his pocket, "Here," faid he, "is a witness which seems at least to prove a criminal correspondence; a lady of virtue would not thus have given her picture to a miserable pil
"grim, who cannot deny it's being found in his "pocket,"

" pocket." Sitvio (whom we must now call fu-LIA) being struck with the found of this voice; lifted up her eyes, and looking stedfastly on her accufer trembled, and growing pale, fainted away. Every one approached her to offer their affiftance, but particularly a stranger, who was one of her judges, and who notwithstanding her disguise, knew her immediately, and embracing her with inexpressible transports of joy, "Oh! my Julia, " adorable JULIA, is this a dream, or a reality? and is it possible that I have now the happiness to find you living, after having fo long lamented " your death?" Every one imagined the stranger had loft his fenses, while it seemed as if his voice had animated Julia with new life, and opening her eyes, the first object she saw was her dour HYPOLITUS on one fide, and the earl of BED-FORD her hufband, on the other. In the confufion, which had happened on her fainting, and the name of JULIA being repeated, another of the indges ran towards her : "Here is your daughter," faid HYPOLITUS, to him, " my lord this is JULIA." The earl of WARWICK, (for it was he) embraced his daughter with transports of joy, and she throwing herfelf at his feet, bathed them with her tears, expression fuch lively transports of duty duty and love, that nothing could be more tender and moving.

THE earl of BEDFORD acted a very difagreeable part in this happy scene. The marchiones of BECARELLI, her father, count BENTIVOGT Lio, and all who could come near the happy triumvirate made the court refound with joyful acclamations, without exactly knowing the reason, Julia transported with joy, notwithstanding the presence of her lord, declared before the court who she was, at which was heard a confuted found of voices, but the company foon after obferved a profound filence, and she continuing he discourse, added that the earl of BEDFORD, was the accuser, and husband to the marchion of BECARELLI, was also her's, and of consequence had two wives, which he could not deny; and as he had profecuted those two ladies, they now refolved to profecute him in turn. The earl of WARWICK, and the marchioness's father, define the count BENTIVOGLIO to cause him to bearrefted, and tried according to the laws of the country, on which he was immediately conveyed to prison, and soon after gave the following relation:

[&]quot;THAT having believed the account of the " death of Julia, which he received from the " abbess of St. Menoux, to be true, he quitted " England, with intention to travel, chusing to begin by Italy, where he had many relations; " that the marquis of BECARELLI being one of " the number, he went to Bologna to visit him, " and having feen his daughter fell in love with " her, and at last obtained her father's consent to marry her, on condition that he should take " his name and arms. That fome time after he went to Florence, with his father-in-law, and being one day at church faw LUCILLA and " JULIA enter, the latter dreffed in a widow's habit : which unexpected fight affected him great-Being very unwilling his father-in-law should fuspect any thing of his marriage, he " gained one of the fenator ALBERTI's dome-" flics to affift him in a project he had formed : ofter which he returned to Bologna, where he remained fometime with his lady, but could enw joy no repose, fearing a discovery of his former " marriage. This made him return to Florence. se after having chose a convent for Julia near " Sienna, in which he was determined to flut " her up during life. The fenator ALBERTI's " fervant, whom he bribed, informed him he had " not a moment to lose, if he intended carrying off " the fair English woman, with whom he thought " his lordship was in love, because his master had " given him orders to be ready that fame night, " for the like purpose. That having masked him-" felf with three others, and having an equipage " ready, he carried her off; but being overtaken, " fhe was rescued from him, and he had the mis-" fortune to be wounded by a piftol-shot, which " obliged him to remain at Sienna; where he " frequently received intelligence from Ever-" NIA, one of the marchioness's women, whom " he had bribed, and was by her informed, that " his lady was extremely fond of a pilgrim, who " fhe brought to the caftle. This news enra " him fo much that he immediately returned, " folving to profecute them with the utmost ri-" gour,"

WHILE he remained in confinement, torments by rage and jealoufy, he was feized with a violent fever which from the first day seemed to threaten his life. The wound he received in carrying off Journal grew worse; his impatience to return, and punish the insidelity of the marchloness, not giving him time to wait till it should be healed. While he thought thought of nothing but death, JULIA, the earl of WARWICK and HYPOLITUS tafted all the pleafures imaginable from a meeting fo unexpected; this fincere lover, and faithful mistress, acquainted each other with their fufferings, shedding mutual tears of joy, as they never expected the happiness of meeting again. "How shall I express my grief, my dear Julia," faid he, " on hearing the fatal news " of your death; I thought of nothing but to follow you, it was my only wish, and has ever been; " though death whom I fought with fuch determined resolution, and whom I braved amidst the greatest dangers, has yet spared me. I did not even receive a wound, during the time I remained on board the Maltese gallies; but at last everwhelmed with grief, which was not in the least diminished by time, I resolved to visit my fifter, that I might pass some days with her " in talking of you; and having acquainted your father, and the earl of Sussex with my defign, the former determined to accompany me; as our flay could not be long, honour obliging us to return to Malta, and lord Sussex fet out on his return to London, having received " news from the marchioness of NORTHAMPTON which gave him hopes of being foon united to " that " that lovely woman; after staying some time " at Venice, we fet out for Fiorence, but your father having received a wound on board the " gallies, it grew worse by the fatigue of travel-" ing, which obliged us to ftop here. We fre-" quently visited the count BENTIVOGLIO, and " as the affair of the marchioness of BECARELLE " feemed very extraordinary, he told us every day " fome news of the lady and the pilgrim. Alas my " dear mistress, little did I imagine that same pil-" grim was my dear JULIA, whose death I hourly " lamented; but as the marquis of BECARELLI. or to fay better the earl of BEDFORD, requested " that there should be an equal number of English " and Italian judges, as he feared the partiality " the latter would make them decide it ag " him, the governor defired us to be of the num " ber; could any thing be more whimfical? I " was your judge against your husband! the rest " madam, you know, but you cannot possibly be " fensible of the transporting joy which I have I " fince this happy day." JULIA replied in the most tender manner, and convinced her lover that he was ever dear to her, and that she knew perfectly well the value of fuch a tender passion as his.

Ir would be difficult to express the trouble and confusion of the lovely marchioness of BECAREL-LI at the fight of JULIA, which brought to her rememberance, her weakness for Silvio, whose, image made fuch a lively impression on her heart, " I own," faid she to Julia, " that I felt more " pain at the loss of SILVIO, than I did at any ac-" cident that ever befel me ; and though I was refolved never to fee him more and die rather than " endeavour to assuage my pain, yet his being in " the world was sufficient to make me hope that I should at last meet with him; but now, my " grief is without remedy. I am yet in love, but " it is with a shadow." " My dear marchioness," splied Julia with tendernels, " if I cannot answer your wishes, at least I have a heart fusceptible of the most perfect friendship. You were less dear to Silvio than you are to Ju-" LIA." The fair Italian kept a profound filence, which she interrupted with sighs, looking frequently on Julia with eyes full of despair, and often quitted her in a flood of tears,

THE profecution was carried on with fuch vigour aginst the earl of BEDFORD, by the fathers of his two wives, as made him begin to dread its consequence;

consequence; and his illness encreased in such a manner that it almost reduced him to the last extremity. This ferved to difarm the refertment of the two ladies, who caused him to be conveyed to the Castle, and each giving way to pity rather than revenge, they attended him in a manner which had fomething very generous, and at the fame time fingular in it ; but he died in a few days. overwhelmed with grief and despair. The marchioness of BECARELLI immediately took leave of Julia, "I am going," faid she " to tear my-" felf for ever from your fight, and fince it is im-" possible you can be mine, I am resolved never " to be another's. I will be a nun, and concea " my love and shame from all the world." I LIA did every thing in her power to make he change her resolution, but without effect; and the marchioness rising with quickness, went out of the apartment, and foon after entered a convent, and took the veil, notwithstanding the entreaties and grief of her father.

JULIA set out for Florence, in company with her father and lover; they had already been acquainted with the death of the senator ALBERTS they went to the house so soignior LEANDER whom

whom they found in deep mourning, but his trouble did not prevent his joy from breaking out at fight of persons so dear to him; and LUCILLA could scarce contain her's. The continual disquietudes for her brother and JULIA, damped the pleasures the enjoyed with a hulband of such great merit as feignior LEANDER. The earl of WAR-WICK would not delay any longer the happiness of the faithful Hypolitus, and the fair Julia. Their wedding was celebrated at LEANDER'S country feat. Never did the fun enlighten a more greeable festival! never did two lovers enjoy with greater fatisfaction the pleasures of an union, which had cost them fo many fighs and tears; and here never was a more general joy, than that mewn at their arrival in England, on account of their marriage. They found the illustrious earl of Sussex united to the lovely marchioness of NORTHAMPTON. HYPOLITUS took the title of earl of Douglas, and he was diftinguished as one of the politest, best, and bravest men of the age in which he lived.

THE END

routhe state of the section of the sect The state of the s it at LLA fqui-the The state of the s A service of the great AR-THE HOLLENSTON WITH STREET similar at a series was a series inefs LIA. the state of the state of the ER'S A THE REAL PROPERTY AND A STATE OF THE PARTY A and my property of the same of enjoy and the state of t nion, to the state of the second of the second and 25 such as distributed a partie was that AND THE PERSON NAMED OF STREET the state of the party of ount Something and the same of the same s earl s of who town a discovering or integral field tle of At the street with s one A Committee of the last world ge in Stoll to Land & Comme